THE LION'S MOUTH.

"THE gravest beast is an ass, the gravest bird is an owl, the gravest fish is an oyster, and the gravest man is a fool." SYDNEY SMITH.

"I WILL roar, that I will do any man's heart good to hear me."
A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

"I WILL aggravate my voice so, that I will roar you as gently as any sucking dove; I will roar you an 't were any nightingale." IBID.

"Nil falsi audeat, nil veri non audeat dicere." CICERO.

The Lion's Mouth.

Once a Week, in a sketch of the haunts of harmony in Loudon, devotes considerable space to a description of Evans', the most fashionable and well-known music and supper hall in London. It has the following concerning one of the chief ornaments of the old hall—the Lion's Moath:

"A curious head, described in certain numbers of the Guardian for the year 1713, and designed as a box for the reception of literary contributions, was purchased by Mr. Richardson, the late proprietor of 'Evans',' against the Duke of Norfolk, and treated to a post of honor above the chimney-piece in the old music room. It bore a fanciful resemblance to a lion, and its claws were of the most formidable description. It was put up at Button's Coffee House in July 1713, removed to the Shakspeare Tavern in 1781, and bought by Mr. Richardson on the 8th of November 1809. It was described by its proprietoras being 'indeed a proper emblem of knowledge and action, for it was 'all h[illegible] paws.' 'Its features,' add? the writer, are strong and well furrowed.' The 'whiskers' gained the admiration of every one that saw them."

Entente Cordiale.

We always believed thoroughly in the truth of the saying "extremes meet." Extremes are meeting fast in the world of journalism. The radically Republican Flag is doing everything in its power to conciliate the radically Democratic Examiner—the only paper for which at present it has a good word to say. In Wednesday's issue it said: "We borrow and express the fullest reliance on the judgement of the Examiner." It is only right to say that the judgement of the Examiner was on this occasion given not with regard to reconstructiou, universal snffrage or the execution of Mrs. Surratt, but the merits of the Mexican poet Señor Gullardo's drama entitled The Sorceress of Cordova. Notwithstandiug this, we advise the radical subscribers to the Flag to keep an eye on it. Who knows but what it may not amalgamate with the Examiner.

A Very Small Affair.

The Flag thus describes the "St. James' Picnic:"

"The Sanday School, some eight mutes, a number of policemen, detailed for the purpose, with their wives and friends, left on the steamer Contra Costa to go to Saucelito."

How some eight mntes, and a number of policemen, detailed for the purpose, with their wives and friends can be called a Sunday School we cannot imagine. We are afterward told that, "groups of hungry, sedate people assembled sub tegminnie fagi, in all the freedom of the country, to eat their lunches." What sort of a minnie a "tegminnie" is we do not know. A Tityrus or two, thrown round loose among the eight mntes, and the policemen's wives and friends, would have given a classic air to this description of the St, James' Picuic.

A Libel on the Jews.

The Hebrew National, a new Jewish weekly published in London, complains that the last English edition of Webster's Dictionary contains the verb "to jew," and defines it as "to cheat," "to swindle." It is a positive fact that this verb is in common use among all classes in England, and perhaps it may be used iu the same manner among stockholders in the insurance companies in New York; but we hold it not right that it should be so set down, and we do not wonder at the indignation manifested by the Hebrew National. On asking a Teutonic Hebrew his opinion on the subject he said: "Oh yes, 'to jew,' das ist right. I know the word; but is is not to scheat. 'To jew'—das ist pusiness."

The Oakland Poundmaster.

The poundmaster in Oakland does not employ his time in running afte little dogs and catching them. He catches hogs. The other day he caught Mr. Hogan's hog, and Mr. Hogan the next time he passed him swore like a man and grunted an imitation of a hog. The poundmaster not taking into considcration the fact that Mr. Hogan was only swearing to himself, and had a right to recall to his recollection the voices of his lost ones by grunting, had him arrested. We should like to hear anyone whose dog had been taken to the pound bark wheu our poundmaster passed him—he would very soon get muzzled.

What the Potrero Hogs Said and Thought.

"We are becoming famous. There is an excitement in the city over youder relative to our removal to some more distaut point. The race hereahout complain of us. They say we do not furnish them with the odors of Arahy the Blest. Quite the reverse. For my part I am glad. Why do they thus imprison us. Why give they not to us the freedom of these hills? Curse them. They drive us, they impound us, and finally murder us. May my flesh abouud in trichina after death for their benefit."

So spake Gobble, an old hog, to his companions ahont the feeding trough. Gobble stood with both fore feet in his breakfast. Not merely bis owu breakfast, hut that of three or foar diminutive pigs who loudly clamored in his rear, and vainly sought to squeeze themselves into their places at the table.

"What a bore that Gobble is," said Mrs. Wallow, a sharp-nosed, vinegar-faced sow with nine small childreu at the breast. "Old Gobble is always ready to talk of the wrong aud oppression of others, but he takes very good care to get his own fill of swill if others do suffer. Even now he robs four of my last year's children of their breakfast."

"And he their father too, is he not?" said a spruce young barrow.

"I believe he is," said Mrs. Wallow reflectively.

Grant came ulong talking, squealing and singing hoisteronsly. He was half druuk with mash from the distilleries.

"What is mun?" said he, "that he claims superiority over us. He is a carniverous beast. So am I. He is a gramuniverous brute. So am I. Is he particularly clean ahout his person? Neither am I. In real common sense, I am his superior. I live solely and entirely for happiness. I am not ashamed so to act as to secure happiness To be happy, I bathe in mud. I have seen men ashamed to eat fine swill out out of a common troagh. They were afraid of each other. Bosh!

At that moment a tremendous squealing of rejoicing arose from a group of hogs gathered in the centre of the pen. What was the matter? Gohble turned half round and was on the point of so forgetting himself as to leave his breakfast. A moment's reflection suggested to him the stern truth of the four little pigs behind him. He awaited the event like a philosopher. Grunt stopped his bubbling. Mrs. Wallow carried away by curiosity, deserted her infant progeny and ran toward the excited crowd. They were gathered ahout the scrap of a morning paper wafted thither by the wind. An elderly swine, after putting on his spectacles, read aloud the following opiuion of Judge Rix:

"If they, (the hog ranchers,) after gainiug all the time possible by continuances, demand jury trials, and after conviction, appeal the cases to the County Court, they are pickliag a pretty rod for the backs."

Leading the World.

"The United States are the vanguard of freedom" says the Alta. "Vanguard of freedom" is good, but it was said before. To continue, the Alta farther remarks: "It has fallen to our lot to lead the world for a century or two at least in breaking the social, political and religious bonds in which our race was bound in semi-barbarous times, aud in which it has languished for several thousaud years." There is an alarming loosenese and recklessuess in speaking of a century or two, as if a century was a period of little weight in the Alta's estimation. In 1767 the United States did not lead the world entirely. Besides there were no United States at that period. Perhaps, however, we are hypercritical. The Alta doubtless refers to the spirit of the people and its effects on the world, rather than to any special gov ermental organization. Still we did not lead the world entirely at that period, and we are sure we did not in 1667, which is only going back a hundred years. There were a few thinkers, writers, philosophers and statesmen in Europe "a century ago" who helped lead the world.

Hard on the English Aristocracy.

A Mr. Jobson, who has lately arrived here by way of Australia, informed one paper in this city that he was a connection of the Duke of Wellington, and on the Times informiug the people of this city that they had "a recently imported celebrity among them," sent a communication to that paper in which he said "he was anything but proud of his connection with the aristocracy of England," aud also said "it had cost him dear." This is hard on the aristocracy, and we are sure if they were aware that Jobson was saying such things of them they would be very much annoyed. We nnderstand that Emperor Norton is in a towering passion, and intends to issue a proclamation against Johson immediately. He says either he or Johson must leave the city.

The Poor.

The Call says in an article relative to the seven thousand four hundred and five persons relieved by the San Francisco Benevoleut Association, "The poor we have always among us." That is so. Poverty is a commodity always in market, never inquired for or wanted, and the supply is always largely in excess of the demand.

Inquiry Financial and Im-Biblical.

"Are we to have a financial crash?" is a question often asked in the East. In San Francisco more are interested in the daily mental nquiry, "Are we to have a braudy smash?"

A Terrible Endemic.

San Francisco has escaped the epidemics which have troubled other cities; there has heen no cholera here, no rinderpest and but little diptheria. Under these circumstances our citizens can sustain themselves with great fortitude, though the endemic of "Correspondence from the Southern Coast" is raging. The Alta has broken out in boils, blains and putrefying sores. Vile, ungramatical eruptions appear on its face daily. It is inoculated with Santa Cruz viras, and will shortly exhibit the Warm Springs, Calistoga and Crystal Springs varieties of the endemic. On Thursday, the Bulletin caught it. "K" wrote "from the Southern Coast" on "Some Cheese," "Wild Mnstard" "Santa Maria Plains," "Foxens" aad other terrible subjects. He tells the intelligent public of San Francisco that be learned from a "teat puller" that Judge Steele is making 450 ponuds of cheese a day. Ho then recommends the aforesaid Judge's wild mnstard as being of "u fine quality for table use." "K" is the best of these horrible prowling correspondents who have as yet blistered the columns of the daily press, hut he is bad enough. Who on earth wants to know anything about Santa Barbara, wild mastard, and teat pullers? When it begins to get hot in San Francisco all the people who have money to spend will leave it—for some warmer place—and those whose business or impecuniosity compells them to remaiu in town, will suffer daily torture from correspondents who wish to make those they have left behind them as miserable as possible.

Ladies Wearing the Mustn't-mention-'ems.

There was a terrible commotion in San Francisco when Mrs De Wolf first appeared in public in unwhisperables, and most of the ladies were shocked. If the Appeal is to be believed, the ladies of Marysville have come to the conclusion that, though improper for a walking costnme, the what-d'ye-call-'ems are quite correct on horseback. This paper says:

"They propose to throw away the cumbersome and horse-scaring flonnces and adopt the Turkish style of habit, use the male saddle, and mount their steeds the same as 'other folks.'"

This is just simply an excuse for wearing the aforesaid articles of apparel which every married lady is supposed to covet. If ladies must ride on horses man-fashion they should adopt the style of hab worn by the Sandwich Island ladies. The Appeal says farther:

"The ladies have heeu taking this matter under serious consideration of late, and have bravely resolved to defy old fogyism and ride as sense and comfort dictate. We understand a party of five or six of our most respectable citizens are preparing their Turkish dresses, aud will be ready to take the air on horseback the latter part of this week."

They had better not come down to San Francisco or they will be arrested. Turkish dresses forsooth! Perhaps the dissolute editor of the Appeal (he cannot be a virtuous respectable man as all our San Francisco editors are) would like to see other Turkish habits introduced among the ladies of Marysville.

Summer Sports.

It is rather amasing to hear Englishmen abusing the Climate of San Francisco. The merry month of May must be delightful. The following dispatch reached us hy the cable:

"LONDON, May 23—The Derby was won by Hermit. There was an immense crowd in atteudance. A snow storm prevailed during the race."

The merry May days of England appear to be "played out," as we say in California. A race in a snow storm is a pleasing novelty. We must, however, state in justice to the climato of England, had as it really is, a snow storm in May is quite a stranger, but we doubt if Englishmeu as a stranger give it welcome.

"Local Art Items."

Under this head the Bulletin of yesterday informs its readers that four young men took the Petalnma boat, on the day previous, on their way for a tour through the coast range country to Yreka and thence to Portland, Oregon. The Bulletin says that these young men—all unknown to Fame—are "well supplied with materials for making oil sketches." All things considered, we think that San Francisco people and newspapers had better encourage and try to support the really good artists already here, instead of petting young beginners in art, who, if they stay here, will starve.

An Immoral Atmosphere.

We find the following paragraph in one of our exchanges:

"Three of the Japanese gymnasts got drunk at Hartford recently fought the police, and were finally locked up for the night."

The above fact, if it is a fact, is very discreditable to Hartford. None of the Japanese gymnasts got drunk in San Francisco. But that is always the way as soon as people get out of the moral atmosphere of Sun Francisco they become demoralized. We tremble when we think that even Tom Maguire's morals may become corrupted in the East.

Highly Important from England.

The important information that the Star "says it will be a crime to execute the Fenians" came over the wires this week. There is a little penny paper of that name published in London, but its opinion is of very little value either in England or Ireland. As we learned by dispatches sent across the cable that "was not probable that any of the Fenians would be hanged, the opinion of the Star is particularly valuable to citizens of San Francisco

BLACK SHEEP

BY EDMUND YATES.

Author of "Land at Last," "Kissing the Rod," etc.

FROM CHARLES DICKENS' MAGAZINE, "ALL THE YEAR ROUND."

BOOK III.

CHAPTER XV.—CONCLUSION OF BLACK SHEEP.

THE ordinary bnsiness of the place and the occasion went on, intensified in interest to the spectators by the presence of the murdered man's father, in the sensational character of a witness. Harriet's relation to the prisoner was not divined by the public, and so she passed unnoticed.

Jim Swain was, of course, the chief witness, and he told his story with clearness and directness, though he was evidently and deeply affected by the sight of Harriet, whom his quick eye instantly recognised. She took no notice; she did not change her position, or raise her veil as the examination of the boy proceeded, as minute by minute she heard and felt the last chance, the last faint hope of escape, slip away, and the terrible certainty of doom become clearer and more imminent. She heard and saw the boy—whose story contained the destruction of hope and life, showed her the utter futility of all the plans they had concocted, of all the precautions they had taken; showed her that while they had fenced themselves from the danger without, the unsuspected ruin was close beside them, always near—wholly unmoved. It had come, it had happened; all was over, it did not matter how. There was no room for anger, no power of surprise or curiosity left in her mind. As the golden locket was produced, and the identity of the portrait with that of the murdered man was sworn to, a kind of vision came to her. She saw the bright spring morning once more, and the lonely bridge; she saw the river with the early sunlight npon it; she saw herself leaning over the parapet and looking into the water, as the parcel she had carried thither with careful haste sank into the depth and was hidden. She saw herself returning homeward, the dangerons link in the evidence destroyed, passing by the archway, where a boy lay, whom she had pitied, even then, in her own great and terrible anguish. If anything could be strange now, it would be strange to remember what he then had in his possession, to render all her precantion vain. But she could not feel it so, or think about it; all things were alike to her henceforth, there was no strangeness or familiarity in them for evermore. Occasionally, for a minute, the place she was in seemed to grow unreal to her, and to fade; the next, she took up the full sense of the words which were being spoken, and every face in the crowd, every detail of the building, every accident of the scene, seemed to strike upon her brain through her eyes. She never looked at him, but she saw him distinctly; she saw also the look with which Routh regarded him.

That look was murderons. As the boy's story made his motives evident, as it exposed the fallacious natnre of the security on whieh Routh had bnilt, as it made him see how true had been Harriet's prevision, how wise her connsel—thongh he hated her all the more bitterly as the knowledge grew more and more irresistible—the murderous impulse rose to fury within him. Standing there a prisoner, helpless, and certain of condemnation, for he never had a donbt of that, the chain he had helped to forge by his counsel to Dallas was too strong to be broken; he would have taken two more lives if he had had the power and the ehance—the boy's, and that accursed woman's. Not his wife's, not Harriet's; he knew now, he saw now, she had not brought him to this. But the other, the other, who had tempted him and lured him; who had defeated him, rnined him, and escaped. He knew her shallow character and her cold heart, and his fierce, vindictive, passionate, sensnl nature was stirred by horrid pangs of fury and powerless hate as he thought of her—of the triumphant beauty whieh he had so coveted, of the wealth he had so nearly clutched—triumphant, and happy, and powerful still, while he—he——! Already the bitterness and blackness of death were npon him.

And the boy! So powerful, even now, was the egotism of the man's nature, that he winced under the pain of the defeat the boy had inflicted upon him—winced nnder the defeat while he trembled at the destruction. He had kept him near him, nnder his hand, that if the need should arise he might nse him as an instrument for the ruin of George Dallas, and so had provided for his own ruin. The active hate and persistent plan of another could not have worked more surely against him than he had himself wrought, and the sense of the boy's instrumentality became unbearably degrading to him, wounding him where he was most vulnerable.

Thus all black and evil passions raged in his heart; and as his wife looked in his face, she read them there as in a printed book, and onee again the feeling of last night came over her, of the strangeness of a sudden cessation to all this, and also something like a dreary satisfaetion in the knowledge that it was within her power and his to bid it all cease—to have done with it.

Looking at him, and thinking this, if the strange dream of her mind may be called thought, the curiosity of the crowd began to anger her a little. What was the dead man to them, the nameless stranger, and they should care for the discovery—that they should come here to see the agony of another man, destined, like the first, to die? The popular instinct filled her with loathing, but only momentarily; she forgot to think of it the next minute, and the vagueness came again, the film and the dimness, and again the acute distinctness of sound, the intensity of vision.

It was over at length. The prisoner was committed for trial. As he was removed with the celerity usual on snch occasions, Harriet made a slight sign to the solicitor acting for Ronth—a sign evidently preconcerted, for he approached the magistrate, and addressed him in a low voice. The reply was favorable to his request, and he, in his turn, signed to Harriet, who left her place and came to where he was standing. He placed her in the box, and she stood there firmly, having bowed to the magistrate, who addressed her:

"You are the prisoner's wife?"

"I am."

"Yon wish to speak to me?"

"I wish to ask yonr permission to see my husband before he is removed."

"You may do so. Take care of the lady."

This to one of the officials. The tone of the magistrate's reply to Harriet was compassionate, though he spoke briefly; and he looked intently at her as she bowed again and turned meekly away. He has said, since then, that he never saw supreme despair in any face before.

"You have not much time," the policeman said, not unkindly, who conducted her to the lock-np cell where Ronth was. She made no answer, but went, and the door was locked behind her. He was sitting on a bench exactly in front of the door, and the moment she passed it her eyes met his. Fury and gloom were lowering upon his face; he looked up sullenly at her, but did not speak. She stood by the door, leaning against it, and said, in a low toue:

"I have but little time, they tell me. I am come to learn yonr will. It was agreed between us, once, that if the worst came, I should supply you with the means of disposing of your fate. I remembered that agreement, and I have brought you this."

She put her hand in her bosom, and took out of her dress a small phial. It contained prussic acid, and was sealed and stoppered with glass.

He started and groaned, but did not yet speak.

"The worst has come," she said. "I do not say you ought not to face it ont, still I only do as you onee desired me to do in such a case. The decision is with yourself. This is my only opportunity of obeying you, and I do so."

"The worst has come," he said, in a hoarse voice, not in the least like his own; "you are sure the worst has come? He said it was a bad case, a very bad case. Yes, the worst has come."

Her hand was stretched out, the phial in it. He made no attempt to take it from her. She held it still, and spoke again:

"I have very little time. You will be searched presently, they tell me, and this will be found, probably. I have obeyed you to the last, as from the beginning."

"There's no chance—you are qnite sure there is no chance?"

"I am quite sure there is no chance. I have always known, if this happened, there could be no chance."

He muttered something under his breath.

"I do not hear you," she said. "You are reproaching me, I dare say, but it is not worth while. If you make uo use of this, you will have time to reproach me as much as you like. If you do make use of it, reproach is past, with time and life. Have you decided?"

"No," he said; "give it to me. If I use it, it must be very soon—if not, never."

She laid the phial on the bench beside him, and he took it up, and placed it in his breast pocket. She did not touch him, but when she had laid the phial down, stepped back, and leaned against the door.

"Is there anything you want to know—anything I can tell you?" she asked. "Again, my time is very short."

"No," he said; "if I make up my mind to go through this I shall know all I want; if I don't, I need not know anything."

"Just so," she said qnietly. He looked on the ground, she looked at him.

"Harriet," he said, snddenly, "I am sorry, I——"

"Hnsh," she said, flnshing scarlet for one brief moment, and putting out her hand. "No more. All is over, and done with. The past is dead, and I am dead with it. Not a word of me."

"But if—if——" he touched his coat-pocket. "I must first know what is to become of you."

"Must you?" she said, and the faintest possible alteration came in her voice—a little, little softening, and a slight touch of surprise. "I think you might have known that I shall live until I know that you are no longer living."

"Sorry to interrupt you, ma'am," said the policeman who had brought Harriet to the cell, unlocking the door with sharp suddenness—"very sorry, I'm sure; but——"

"I am quite ready," said Harriet; and, as Routh started np, she turned, and was outside the door in an instant. Two policemen were in the passage; at the door through which she had been led from the court, Ronth's solicitor was standing. He took her arm in his, and brought her away throngh a private entrance. They did not speak till she was in the street, where she saw, at a little distance, a crowd collected to watch the exit of the prison van. He called a cab.

"Where to?"

"My house."

"I will go with you."

"No, thank you. Indeed, I would rather go alone."

"I shall see yon this evening."

She bent her head in reply.

When she was seated in the cab she put out her hand to him, and as she leaned forward he saw her awful face.

"God help you, Mrs. Routh," he said, with intense pity. Then she said, in a clear low voice, whose tone he remembers, as he remembers the face, these words:

"There is no God. If there were, there could be no such men as he, and no such woman as I."

When she was a short distance from the police-court, and beyond the solicitor's sight, she called to the driver from the window that she had changed her purpose, and desired to be set down at St. Paul's Churchyard.

The arrival of the prison van at Newgate excited the usual sensation which it produces among the public who congregate in the neighborhood of the prison to see it discharge its wretched contents. The majority of this crowd were, as usual, of the dangerous classes, and it would have afforded matter of speculation to the curious in such things to look at their faces and calculate, according to the indices there given, how many of the number would one day take a personal part in a spectacle similar to that at which they were gazing with curiosity, which renewed itself daily. On this occasion the sentiment prevalent on the outside of the grim fortress of crime was shared in an unusual degree by the officials, and general, not criminal, inhabitants. Not that a supposed murderer's arrival was any novelty at Newgate, but that the supposed murderer in the preseut instance was not of the class among which society ordinarily recruits its murderers, and the circumstances both of the crime and its discovery were exceptional. Thus, when the gate by which the prisoners were to be admitted unclosed, the yard was full of spectators.

Four prisoners were committed that day: a burglar and his assistant; a merchant's clerk who had managed a forgery so remarkably cleverly that it needed only not to have been found out, to have been a stroke of brilliant genius; and Stewart Routh. The door was opened, the group of spectators gathered round. First the burglar, a wiry little man, more like the tailor of real life than the conventional hero of the center-bit and the jemmy. Next, his assistant, an individual of jovial appearance, tempered with responsibility, like a popular president of school feasts, or the leader of a village choir. Thirdly, the forger, remarkable for nothing in his appearance except its abjectness of fright and bewilderment. These had emerged from the darksome recesses of the hideous caravan, the first and no slight instalment of their punishment, and had been received with comparative indifference. A passing glance was all that was accorded to them by the spectators waiting the appearance of the "gentleman" who was in such very serious "trouble."

But the gentleman did not follow his temporary associates, though the policeman in attendance held the door open, and told him to "come on." Then he stepped into the van and up to the compartment in which Routh had been placed. After an elapse of a full minute he emerged, and addressing the lookers-on generally, he said:

"There's something queer the matter with him, and I think he's dead!"

A stir and confusion among the crowd, and the governor called for. A matter of fact turnkey advances, saying, in a business-like tone:

"Haul him ont, and let's see."

They do haul him out, and they do see. His face is rather bluish in color, and his eyes are open, but his hands are clenched, and his tongue is rigid. And he is quite dead. So there is a great sensation around the prison, the senseless figure is carried into the yard, and the gate is promptly shut, the rumor spreads through the crowd, trying to find chinks which do not exist, and to hear sounds inaudible, that the "murder" case is disposed of, the prisoner having tried, condemned and executed himself. And, though the incident is highly sensational, the general feeling is disappointment.

A woman, plainly dressed and closely veiled, who has been lingering about the street for some time, and was there when the van arrived, has seen the figure lifted from the van, and has heard the rumor. But she waits a little longer, until a policeman comes out of a side entrance, and while some eager inquirers, chiefly women, question him, and he tells them it is quite true, the man committed for trial for the riverside murder is really dead, she stands by and listens. Then she draws her shawl closely round her, and shivers, and goes away. After she has taken a few steps, she falters and sways a little, but she leans against the wall, her hands pressed upon her breast, quietly, attracting no attention, until she has regained her composure, and her breath, and then goes on, along the street, and so out into Holborn.

"She has not been seen or heard of, at his chambers or at home," said Mr. Carruthers to Mr. Felton, late that evening. "Nothing is known of her. They say she has no friends; I could not find out from the servants that she has a single acquaintance even to whose house she could have gone."

Mr. Felton was infinitely distressed by this news which Mr. Carruthers, whose active benevolence, guided by the judgment of others, knew no bounds, brought to his brother-in-law, who was at length exhausted, and unable to rise. They had heard early in the afternoon of the death of Routh, and had all at once been roused to the warmest compassion for Harriet. Clare, having left the unconscious Mrs. Carruthers tranquilly asleep, had gone to Mr. Felton's lodgings, and was there when her uncle came in with his report.

"Laura has no suspicion?" asked Mr. Felton.

"Not the slightest. She has no notion that you and George are not still in Paris. I must say Clare is an admirable girl to keep a secret and play a part."

Clare blushed a little at her uncle's praise.

"What is to be done now about this unfortunate woman? She must be found. Apart from every other consideration, George would be infinitely distressed if any harm came to her."

"I really don't know," said Mr. Carruthers. "There seems to be no clue to her probable movements, and——Come in." This was in answer to a knock at the door.

Jim Swain came in, his face full of eagerness:

"Have you found her, sir? Is she at home? Does she know?"

"No, Jim," said Mr. Felton, "she's not at home, and no one knows anything of her."

"Sir," exclaimed Jim—"miss, I'm sure she's somewheres about the prison. Has any one thought of lookin' for her there? She'd go there, sir and miss—she'd go there. Take me with you, and let us go and look for her. I daren't go alone; she wouldn't listen to me, she wouldn't look at me; but I'm sure she's there."

"Uncle," said Clare, earnestly, "I am sure he's right—I feel sure he is right. Pray go; take one of the servants and him. The carriage is waiting for me; take it and go."

Mr. Carruthers did as she desired. It was wonderful to see the change that had come over him with the awakening of his better nature. He had always been energetic, and now he forgot to be pompous and self-engrossed.

The streets in the dismal quarter of the prison were comparatively silent and empty when Mr. Carruthers called to the coachman to stop, and got out of the carriage, Jim descending from the box, and they began their dismal search. It was not prolonged or difficult.

They found her sitting on the ground, supported by the prison wall, which she had contrived to reach by creeping under the strong barrier of iron spikes which protects the prison on the side which turns its external wall to the street. There, fenced in by the terrible bristling barrier, she lay, in an angle where there was little resort of footsteps and but dim light—a corner in which the tired wayfarer might rest, unquestioned, for a little, by either the policeman or the passer-by. And no more tired wayfarer had ever sat down to rest, even in the pitiless London streets, than the woman who had wandered about until the friendly night had fallen, and had then come there to die, and have done with it.

They took her to her own home, and when they removed her shawl a slip of paper, on which George Dallas' name was written, was found pinned to the front of her dress. It contained these words:

"The boy's story is true. I did not keep the diamonds taken out of the studs. You sold them when you sold your mother's. I was always sorry you ever knew us.

"H. Routh."

* * * * *

George Dallas is in New York with Mr. Felton, who is winding up all his affairs, with a view to a permanent residence in England. Jim Swain, whose education includes the art of writing now, is attached to the personal service of Mr. Dallas, who is understood to be his uncle's heir.

Miss Carruthers is at Poynings, not to be tempted by London and its pleasures; but the absence of the young and beautiful heiress is not so deeply deplored by "society" as it would be, were it not generally known that she is engaged.

[CONCLUDED.]

As an instance of the rapid growth of some of our western cities it may be stated that St. Joseph, Missouri, gained in population, in 1866, over 6,000, or more than 25 per cent.

WHY are good husbands like dough? Because women need them.

JAPAN SOCIETY.

ALL lustres fade, all types decay,
That Time has strength to touch or tarnish
Japan receives itself to-day
A novel kind of varnish.
All Asia moves; in far Thibet
A fear of change perturbs the Lama;
You'll hear the railway whistle yet
Arousing Yokohama!

Methinks it were a theme for song,
This spread of European knowledge;
Gasometers adorn Hong Kong,
Calcutta keeps a college.
Pale Ale and Cavendish maintain
Our hold among the opium smokers;
Through Java jungles runs the train,
With Dutchmen for the stokers.

The East is doomed; Romance is dead,
Or surely on the point of dying:
The travelers' books our boyhood read
Would now be reckoned lying.
Our young illusions vanish fast;
They're obsolete—effete—archaic;
The hour has come that sees at last
The Orient prosaic!

The Brother of the Sun and Moon
Has long renounced his claims excessive;
And now we find a new Tycoon,
Who styles himself "progressive,"
Where once the Dutch alone could trade,
With many a sore humiliation,
The flags are flauntingly displayed
Of every western nation.

The steamers in the harbors smoke;
The Titan-Steam begins its functions;
There'll be a market soon for coke,
When junks give way to junctions!
The oriental little boys,
Who now survey those startling vapors,
Will learn to shout, with hideous noise,
The names of morning papers!

The East is dying: live the East!
With hope we watch its transformation;
Our European life, at least,
Is better than stagnation.
The cycles of Cathay are run;
Begins the new, the nobler movement—
I'm half ashamed of making fun
Of Japanese improvement!

FALSE HAIR.—The London Lancet has been giving a series of articles upon the bad effects which results from the use of false hair. In its last article it says: "The fact that a very large amount of the artificial hair is originally studded over with the egg bags of the common pediculus, is one of the best evidences that the individuals from whom the hair has been obtained were strangers to habits of cleanliness. In much of the hair that comes into the English market, especially that of a lighter shade, the distal half of the shaft is dotted over with what are generally regarded as "nits." These are of two kinds; the one attached laterally—ova remains; and a second form which, surrounding the hair, is difficult to detach (more difficult than the true "nits"), and may be found on the hair that has been prepared and cleansed for sale. The latter is nothing more nor less than a collection of vegetable sporules or cells similar to those which are found in the various forms of ringworm. They are not destroyed by many of the processes to which the hair is subjected in its preparation; and there can be no doubt that, when placed upon a favorable soil, they would speedily grow and produce serious diseases. Fortunately the scalp of adults does not form a favorable nidus for these parasitic germs, but in some instances of scurfy disease of the scalp there is reason to think they are the true cause of mischief. In the case of the young, it cannot be doubted that ringworm would be produced by their growth; and the fact is certain that many ladies carry about with them in their "chignons" the seeds of "ringworm"—an intractable malady. There is also a novel species of false hair in the market; it is called "churchyard hair," and consists not only of the shafts but the roots also, and hence must have been pulled from the scalp of the dead!—a horrible idea, and one that should certainly make ladies revolt against the present absurd and uncleanly fashion.

A JOKE THAT PAID.—Count Bismarck recently presented a faithful but poor secretary with a portfolio bound like a book, in which were deposited five thousand thalers. On meeting his secretary next day, the Count asked him if he had perused the volume. "Yes, your highness," said the secretary, "and I am so captivated by its contents that I am waiting the appearance of the second volume with feelings of the greatest interest," The Count smiled, but said nothing. A few days afterward the secretary received a second portfolio, bound and filled like the first, and on the title page of which was the sentence: "This work is complete in two volumes."

AT a morning performance, in Paris, of "the Pirates of the Savannah," (the piece in which the Menken appears,) the large sum of nine thousand, four hundred francs was taken.

PREJUDICES are like rats, and a man's mind like a trap; they get in easily, and then perhaps can't get out at all.

A VERY PLEASANT EVENING.

YOU may not be surprised if I call upon you to prepare for your domestic pleasures with a little suffering; nor, when I tell you what such pleasures are, must you exclaim against them as absurd. Having the sanction of our forefathers, they are what is fashionable now, and consequently they are what is fit. I propose, then, that you should give for the entertainment of your friends an evening party; and as this is a scene in which young ladies prominently figure, I will, if you please, on this occasion, pay particular attention to your daughter.

O, mystery of preparation!—Pardon, sir. You err if you suppose me to insinuate that ladies are more careful over personal adornment than the gentlemen. Man at his grimmest is as vain as woman, even when he stalks about bearded and battle-axed. This is the mystery of preparation in your daughter's case; how does she breathe? You have prepared her from childhood for the part she is to play to-night, by training her form into the only shape which can be looked on with complacency in any ball-room. A machine called stays, introduced long since into England by the Normans, has had her in its grip from early girlhood. She has become pale, and—only the least bit—liable to be blue about the nose and fingers. Stays are an excellent contrivance; they give a material support to the old cause, unhealthiness at home. This is the secret of their excellence. A woman's ribs are narrow at the top, and as they approach the waist they widen, to allow room for the lungs to play within them. If you can prevent the ribs from widening, you can prevent the lungs from playing, which they have no right to do, and make them work. This you accomplish by the agency of stays. It fortunately happens that these lungs have work to do—the putting of the breath of life into the blood—which they are unable to do properly when cramped for space; it becomes about as difficult to them as it would be to you to play the trombone in a in a china-closet. By this compression of the chest ladies are made nervous, and become unfit for much exertion.

Well, your daughter comes down stairs dressed, with a bonquet, at a time when the dull seeker of health and strength would have her go up stairs with a bed-candlestick. Your guests arrive. Young ladies thinly clad, and packed in carriages, emerge half stifled, put a cold foot protected by a filmy shoe, upon the pavement, and run, shivering, into your house. Well, sir, we'll warm them presently.

But suffer me to dance a polka with your daughter. Frail, elegant creature that she is! A glass of wine—macaroon—good. That was a delightful dance; now let us promenade. The room is close; a glass of wine, an ice, and let us go to the delicious draught in the conservatory, or by that door. Is it not beautiful? The next quadrille—I look slily at my watch, and Auber's grim chorns rumbles within me. "Midnight!" Another dance. How fond she seems to be of macaroons. Supper. My dear sir, I will take good care of your daughter. One sandwich. Champagne. Blancmange. Bonbon. Champagne. Sherry. Champagne. Tipsy-cake. Brandy cherries. Glass of wine. A macaroon. Trifle. Jelly. Champagne. Custard. Macaroon. The ladies are being cared for. Yes; now in their absence we will drink their health—their and our bad healths. This is the happiest moment of our lives; at two in the morning, with a dose of indigestion in our stomach, and three hours more to come before we get to bed. You, my dear sir, hope that, on many occasions like the present, you may see your friends around you, looking as glassy-eyed as you have made them to look now. We will rejoin the ladies.

Nothing but champagne could have enabled us to keep up the evening so well. We were getting weary before supper—but we have had some wine, have dug the spurs into our sides, and on we go again. At length even the bottle stimulates our worn out company no more, and then we separate. Good night, dear sir; we have spent a very pleasant evening under your roof.

To-morrow, when you depart from a late breakfast, having seen your daughter's face and her dim and heavy eye, knowing that your wife is bilious, and that your son has just gone out for soda water, you will feel yourself to be a father who has done his duty, a man who has paid something on account of his great debt to civilized society.

A SHORT time ago, at Toledo, Ohio, a cattle-dealer received pay for a steer, which had been sold to a butcher, and rolling the greenbacks into a small wad, put them into his tobacco box. Shortly after, he extricated, as he thought, a portion of the tobacco, but, with all his mastication, could expectorate none of the savory juices, and finally took his quid out of his mouth to look at it, when he found he had been chewing his roll of grecubacks. He stood aghast for a moment, and then burst out: "Confound the luck! a whole steer at one chew!"

CEREMONY was always the companion of weak minds; it is a plant that will never grow in a strong soil.

INNOCENCE is no security against temptation; it is exactly what temptation conquers.

LITERARY GOSSIP AND GLEANINGS.

THE GORILLA CONTROVERSY.

THE hostility which M. Du Chaillu has encountered at the hands of divers English savants and naturalists may, perhaps, be in part accounted for by the fact that he commenced his career as "a young and illiterate trader"—it is thus that Mr. W. Winwood Reade characterizes him—and does not, therefore, belong to the learned guild that is accustomed to claim exclusive authority in all matters connected with the natural sciences. At any rate, we prefer to attribute it to this source than to the circumstance that the now famous African explorer, is an American by birth, and a Frenchman by descent.

But whatever may be the cause of the animosity, there can be no doubt whatever of its existence. "The position of an explorer of unknown countries in England," says Du Chaillu pathetically, "is peculiar, and very difficult. If he returns home with nothing new or striking to relate he is voted a bore, and his book has no chance of being read; if he has some wonders to unfold, connected with Geography, the Natives, or Natural History, the fate of Abyssinian Bruce too often awaits him, his narrative being held up to scorn and ridicule as a tissue of figments."

In a recent number of the Galaxy W. Winwood Reade, the naturalist, has an article entitled "The Facts About M. Du. Chaillu," in which he declares that wishing to settle the question of the veracity of Du Chaillu, he determined to go all the way to the gorilla country for the purpose of investigating it. We fear, from the prevailing spirit of the article, that Mr. Reade made his journey not so much with the purpose of "investigation," as of discovering proofs to support a conclusion already formed. "It seems to be a point of honor in the British naturalist," says a writer in Wilkes' Spirit of the Times, "to doubt M. Du Chailln. That traveler is, we believe, a native of New Orleans, born of French parents, and whether it is in his capacity of American or Frenchman that he so disgusts the British mind, or that it is by those aristocrats of science, the members of the geographical and ethnological societies, considered a piece of presumption in 'a young and illiterate trader' to discover new apes, we know not; but certainly ever since the appearance of M. Du Chaillu's first book he has been like the red rag to our cousin Bull, exciting a degree of rage wholly unintelligible to common humanity. Among the facts to be ascertained were these: Did M. Du Chaillu travel eight thousand miles on foot? Did the bald-headed ape build an umbrella-shaped nest, and sit under it when it rained? Was the young gorilla untamable? Had M. Du Chaillu ever killed a gorilla? Had a gorilla ever killed one of M. Du Chaillu's hunters? Did the gorilla attack its enemies in an erect posture, beating its breast? Now, one would suppose that after all the trouble and expense of a voyage to the gorilla country for the purpose of investigating these facts, that Mr. Reade would have investigated them. What did he do? He tells us that he went first to the missionaries. These worthy men, whose business was with the negroes, and not the apes, could not be supposed to know much about them. They, however, agreed with M. Du Chaillu, that the gorilla attacked without provocation, and always on his hind feet. But lest M. Du Chaillu's reputation should be benefitted by this opinion, for it was probably nothing more, Mr. Reade declares that M. Du Chaillu learned it from the missionaries. Leaving the missionaries, Mr. Reade goes to the natives, with whom he communicates through an interpreter, a serious obstacle, one would imagine, to the pursuit of exact knowledge. In the course of a dinner with a black king, Quengueza by name, that monarch informs him that Paulo (M. Du Chaillu) had been in the habit of shooting gorillas with him in the bush. His next inquiry was of a certain Lady Mary, 'who spoke slowly and thoughtfully.' This thoughtful person denied the truth of the king's statement, and rebuked him, upon which his majesty ate his words in a manner wholly ignoble and unkingly, and denied that Paulo had shot gorillas. And this loose talk of two naked savages, neither of whom could understand the examining counsel, Mr. Reade calls an investigation. Then he calls the hunters of the town together, and proposes to go with them to shoot gorillas. 'Who ever heard of a white man doing that?' said they. 'Why not do as Paulo did, buy the gorillas of us for powder, cloth, and tobacco?' Mr. Reade did not understand that these cunning savages wished to keep white men from their hunting grounds. Then he asked other hunters what Paulo shot. The reply was, 'squirrels, birds, and small monkeys.' Of course he did, for we saw many of these animals in his collection, and no doubt they were more plentiful than gorillas, which do not sit on every tree. But here is no evidence that Mr. Du Chaillu did not kill a gorilla. Why did not Mr. Reade call the only good witness, the beast itself? Why did he not at least try to shoot one, to ascertain whether the thing was practicable and safe. He styles himself a tourist, and, as all Englishmen are by their birthright sportsmen, he should have decided the question face to face with the great ape. Mr. Reade says that Mr. Du Chaillu's statements that he traveled eight thousand miles on foot, is monstrous. He admits that the journeys made by Mr. Du Chaillu were 'creditable to a young and illiterate trader,' though why an illiterate trader, who by Mr. Reade's own account was said by the natives 'to walk the bush well,' could not travel as well as a college graduate, does not appear. He next informs us that the umbrella-shaped nest is a myth, though whether he learned this fact from the thoughtful Lady Mary or the hospitable though irresolute Quengueza he does not say. In this, as in many other instances, we have a mere denial. Let us be thankful for that much. 'The public is not to be bamboozled any more.' Mr. Reade says that the young gorilla which he saw was not ferocious. There may be differences in gorillas as in Englishmen. Some of the latter are like Sir Roderick Murchison, kind and generous to young authors and naturalists, while others fiercely accuse them of literary crimes. Mr. Reade asserts, with the graceful modesty so characteristic of his nation, and which makes them beloved throughout the world, that no hunter has been killed by a gorilla within the memory of man, in any part of the country visited by himself or M. Du Chaillu. It is, after all, a question of evidence between himself and M. Du Chaillu, and we think the rules of evidence are in favor of him who saw, rather than of him who saw not; other things being equal, we must prefer the positive to the negative. Mr. Reade says, finally, that this is a question of science, not of sentiment. From the manner in which he and other Englishmen have discussed it, we should have thought it a question of nationality."

THE GORILLA AT HOME.

The most uncompromising champions of M. Du Chaillu, must, however, admit that in his last volume, "A Journey to Ashango-Land," he has taken back, or considerably modified several of the more sensational statements made in the "Adventures in Equatorial Africa." He admits it is possible to capture the adult female gorilla alive; also, that the gorilla is gregarious, instead of living in pairs, and the whole representation of the creature as it figures in the present work, is very much toned down. Here is a description of three of them captured by the negroes:

"The natives of all the neighboring country were now so well aware that I wanted live gorillas, and was willing to give a high price for them, that many were stimulated to search with great perseverance; the good effects of this were soon made evident.

One day, as I was quietly dining with Captain Holder, of the Cambria (a vessel just arrived from England), one of my men came in with the startling news that three live gorillas had been brought, one of them full-grown. I had not long to wait; in they came. First, a very large adult female, bound hand and foot; then her female child, screaming terribly; and lastly, a vigorous young male, also tightly bound. The female had been ingeniously secured by the negroes to a strong stick, the wrists bound to the upper part, and the ankles to the lower, so that she could not reach to tear the cords with her teeth. It was dark, and the scene was one so wild and strange that I shall never forget it. The fiendish countenances of the Calibanish trio, one of them distorted by pain (for the mother gorilla was severely wounded), were lit up by the ruddy glare of native torches. The thought struck me, what would I not give to have the group in London for a few days!

The young male I secured by a chain which I had in readiness, and gave him henceforth the name of Tom. We untied his hands and feet; to show his gratitude for this act of kindness he immediately made a rush at me, screaming with all his might; happily the chain was made fast, and I took care afterward to keep out of his way. The old mother gorilla was in unfortunate plight. She had an arm broken and a wound in the chest, besides being dreadfully beaten on the head. She groaned and roared, many times during the night, probably from pain.

I noticed next day, and on many occasions, that the vigorous young male, whenever he made a rush at any one and missed his aim, immediately ran back. This corresponds with what is known of the habits of the large males in their native woods; when attacked they make a ferocious rush at their enemy, break an arm or tear his bowels open, and then beat a retreat, leaving their victim to shift for himself.

The wounded female died in the course of the next day; her moaning were more frequent in the morning, and they gradually became weaker as her life ebbed out. Her death was like that of a human being, and affected me more than I could have thought possible. Her child clung to her to the last, and tried to obtain milk from her breast after she was dead. I photographed them both when the young one was resting in its dead mother's lap. I kept the young one alive for three days after its mother's death. I feed it on goat's milk, for it was too young to eat berries. It died the fourth day, having taken an unconquerable dislike to the milk. It had, I think, begun to know me a little. As to the male, I made at least a dozen attempts to photograph the irascible little demon, but all in vain. The pointing of the camera toward him threw him into a perfect rage, and I was almost provoked to give him a sound thrashing. The day after, however, I succeeded with him, taking two views, and not very perfect, but sufficient for my object.

I must now relate how these three animals were caught, premising that the capture of the female was the first instance that had come to my knowledge of an adult gorilla being taken alive. The place where they were found was on the left bank of the Fernand Vaz, about thirty miles above my village. At this part a narrow promontory projects into the river. It was the place where I had intended to take the noted traveler, Captain Burton, to show him a live gorilla, if he had paid me a visit, as I had expected, for I had written to invite him while he was on a tour from his Consulate at Fernando Po to several points on the West African coast.

A woman belonging to a neighboring village had told her people that she had seen two squads of female gorillas, some of them accompanied by their young ones, in her plantain field. The men resolved to go in chase of them; so they armed themselves with guns, axes and spears, and sallied forth. The situation was very favorable for the hunters; they formed a line across the narrow strip of land and pressed forward, driving the animals to the edge of the water. When they came in sight of them, they made all the noise in their power, and thus bewildered the gorillas, who were shot or beaten down in their endeavors to escape. There were eight adult females altogether, but not a single male. The negroes thought the males were in the adjoining woods, having probably been frightened away by the noise."

AMERICAN AND ENGLISH LITERARY PAPERS.

The New York Herald thus remarks upon the difference between European and American periodicals: "In Europe men give up their lives to one definite line of labor, and expect that the solar system will tumble to pieces when they deviate a hair's breadth to the right or left of that line Every little necessary pursuit of civilization is some one's specialty. We see nowhere a better illustration of the difference than in the periodicals of the two emihspheres. London publications are special. It is Punch's vocation to do the fun. It has nothing to do with any subject except as it can draw a laugh from it. If it cannot keep on the broad grin it must maintain silence. The London Illustrated News has no business with any event or fact under the sun unless there are pictures in it. All that lies in the realm of the pictorial artist is fair game; beyond that there is nothing. Other sheets are equally devoted to athletic sports; others again to fiction, and still others to political discussion. In the pages of a single New York periodical we will find all these at once. In Harper's Weekly we find current events pictured with apt and admirable pencil, and on the same page the broad grin of homely humor—the lash of political satire, sometimes rather savage, perhaps—excellent fiction, and often poems of a high order of merit. While good fun is thus shown to be possible, attempts to establish funny papers here always fail. Bonner's irrepressible Ledger has a range but little less extensive than Harper's Weekly. It also supplies its readers with constant novelty in fiction, with well written essays on various topics, and, having due regard to the spice of life, with wit, humor and poesy.

These journals fill the sphere that in Europe would be taken up by half a dozen sheets, each conducted on different plans. Undoubtedly in the matter of the striking difference between the Old World and the New on this point of specialty there are notable advantages and disadvatages on both sides; yet we cannot but regard the American peculiarity as the indication of a fuller and more satisfactory development of the human intellect."

MISCELLANEOUS.

Charles Henry Webb, the founder of THE CALIFORNIAN, has determined to renounce verse-writing—at least, such would seem to be the fair inference from the following screed of "advice" from his pen, which we clip from the New York Weekly Review:

"The world is rife with nobler thought
Than trembles on the tongue;
The world is full of melody,
Unwritten and unsung.
The music of a march is sweet—
But action is sublime:
And each may live a nobler verse
Than e'er was told in rhyme.

Sweep from my sight these foolish books,
They vex my weary brain,
And I will sit at Nature's feet—
Her open page the plain—
And read a pleasant roundelay
In every blade that grows;
A lyric in the lily's leaf,
An epic in the rose!

Let tinklings of the tongue or pen
To love-sick girls belong—
The music of a well-spent life
Is sweeter far than song.
It likes me not, this waste of words—
Our world were not so dead,
If maids and men would cease to write,
And live their verse instead!"

The sentimental and pedantic style of poetry is cleverly parodied, in the following verses, from "Crinkshank's Omnibus." They exemplify the science of horticulture, and purport to be the work of a Dr. Bulgardo. L.S.D., Treasurer of several Learned Societies, and Professor of Asparagus at the University of Battersea. Horticulture is illustrated in lines "To Molly with a basket of fruit and vegetables:"

"Nay! say not shrivell'd—'tis despair
Has thus subdued them, for they see
That in themselves, however fair,
They'll ne'er be relish'd, love, like thee!
A deeper blush the raspberry paints,
Pale is the ruddy beetroot's lip;
And e'en the red-cheek'd apple faints,
As though it suffer'd from the pip.
Severely frown the baking pears;
The artichoke's bold crest is down;
The awe-struck medlar wildly stares
To see thy cheek a swarthier brown.
The icy cucumber is hot,
The freckled cauliflower wan;
The mushroom has no longer got
A single leg to stand upon!
See how the rich, round-shoulder'd figs
Bow to thy figure's graceful swell;
The sobbing orange bursts its pigs
To find thee such a nonpareil!"

DIGNITY.

BY PRENTICE.

I AM an admirer of dignity. I admire it in the judge upon the bench, the divine in the pulpit, the physician as he looks at your tongue or scratches a prescription for your benefit, of most abdominal, revolutionary tendencies.

But such people do not own all the dignity in the world. By no means. Policemen have it. View two of them as they escort a drunken man to the station house. Dignity settles itself in great masses on their faces on such occasions. It is their right to be dignified. It is their only refuge from an unappreciative world which knows nothing of the study, training and experience required properly to conduct a howling inebriate to the station house.

Dignity is an inseparable adjunct to steamboat clerks. I have often watched these beings in awe and admiration as they dispensed tickets to a crowd of struggling wretches. They are superior beings. Nature has endowed them with the extraordinary faculty of selling tickets. The gift commands our respect. Dignity was tacked to it like a sort of massive iron network, grand to behold and impossible to enter. And yet there are people every day who have the temerity to ask unnecessary questions of these herth and passage vending deities instead of applying to the deck hands! But well do they know how to administer just and merited retribution. A sea sick girl is a spectacle of wo. But a sea sick girl is a picture of cheerfulness compared to the man who creeps crushed and withered from the mouth of the steamboat clerk's den after asking some foolish question relative to the route.

I have for sometime been trying to determine which one sustained the greatest load of dignity, the hotel clerk or the bar keeper. Being often under the same roof, there ensues a tremendous contest for supremacy of dignity between them. I know of bar keepers so resplendent with dignity that in their presence I want to go down on my knees and pray. He would be perfect were he not just a trifle soured at the lack of appreciation displayed toward him by a selfish, grovelling world. What know they of the care, the unremitting midnight study of years, the oil consumed, the skill shown in the nice adjustment of sugar to water, of sugar and water to brandy, of brandy sugar and water to ice, of these last four to lemon peel, of all mainpulated with unearthly dexterity, of the necessary combination of orgeat, absynthe, wormwood or other powerful tonic required in the preparation of a brandy smash. How many years of practice were consumed ere that fluid could be slung so wonderfully from one glass to the other. Think you a lawyer or a physician could wipe those tumblers so beautifully bright and clean? Have you ever thought of the figure some mitred prelate would make behind that bar endeavoring to serve twenty Americans calling at once for every variety of stimulant, from simple pop or "whisky straight," up to the most complicated and mysterious vinous and alcoholic combinations? Has not a man a right to be dignified, who, in such emergency, can keep bottles, glasses, spoons, lemons, sugar, ice, straws and strawberries, flying for a minute in apparent chaos above, beneath and around him and while you are stupidly looking on, momentarily expecting the grand smash, Lo! your punch is before you, it is inside of you, there is your change, the bar is cleared, it is wiped, the glasses are clean and in their place and the emissary of Bacchus stands before you erect, grand, quiet, confident, smiling! And yet I have heard such a being termed a "bar keep" by base degenerate men whose very existence was a breach of Nature's great law. I heard lately of a man rash enough to interrupt one of our most talented bar keepers while eugaged in the composition of a punch saying audaciously; "There, that's good enough, you needn't mix it any more." The being gave him one look. Jove's silent frown is more dreadful than all his thunder. That man's whisky drinking prospects were ruined for life. He never drank at a bar again, and making a virtue of necessity joined a temperance society.

There are objects in nature which seem created for no other purpose than to be looked upon from a distance with awe, admiration and terror. Of what seeming use is the iceberg? It is towering, grand, cold, unapproachable. It may be looked upon but not touched, and from it are wafted breezes which chill the blood. What purpose serves the comet? Coming from the unknown regions of the infinite it bears a dread grandeur and sublimity. It is imposing, but it fill the mind with vague forebodings of awful events. We wonder but do not rejoice. And for what did Providence or nature intend the rattlesnake, or the hotel clerk? Such queries weigh upon some reflective minds, driving them to the verge of insanity.

But it is evident that the latter serves upon a smaller scale a like purpose with the iceberg and the comet. He is the embodiment of dignity. A man builds a hotel—no, a palace. It's furnishings are regal. That everything should be in keeping, Caviliers in doublet and hose, princes with plumed caps, covered with stars and orders of merit, and ladies having their trains and attendaut pages should sweep those halls instead of the modern skirts, coats and pantaloons. The practical spirit of the age will not allow this. Still these must be dignity to comport with the palatial caravansary. People from abroad who live plainly, who dine at twelve, who have dinner without soup and wine must be impressed with the dignity of the house. They must become dignified themselves. To become this there must be a fount from which to draw this attribute. The proprietor of the hotel casts about him for such a fount. He searches anxiously and wearily. Daily he posts himself upon the street, and anxiously scans the passers-by. It is tiresome. He becomes moody and abstracted. He grows emaciated and refuses nourishment. His wife grows jealous, thinking his affections are engrossed by some unattainable rival. The hotel remains silent and unoccupied. People wonder why it is not opened. At length, after weeks of weary watching, he sees from afar the "coming man." It is he, the man whose sole occupation through life has been the cultivation of dignity. He reeks with it. It drops from him as he moves majestically along. He does not walk. Do the gods walk? Involuntarily the crowd parts aside from him as he progresses. The proprietor rushes wildly toward him. Terror seizes his heart lest the newly discovered world of dignity be possessed by some rival. He reaches him. He falls upon his knees before him. He cries "Eureka!" Then he faints, then he recovers, then he calls a carriage and bundles himself and the acme of dignity therein. He drives to the hotel. He walls in his treasure behind a mahogany carved counter. He gives him two hundred and fifty dollars per month. It is finished. The statue surmounts the column. Dignity is enthroned.

And yet this man is my benefactor. For years I have been snubbed by humanity. I, too, am a trifle soured. He is my avenger. In the avenging mood I go and sit humbly in his court. I behold a presumptuous man feebly inquiring relative to some friends suspected of stopping at the hotel. And the Being flashes down thunderbolts of dignity upon him, and man abjectly retires with the sense of degredation and inferiority strong upon him. I am gratified. He is a representative of the race whose hands have so heavily been laid upon me. Now he is smitten. Now he "knows how it feels." I go forth rejoicing.

MACDONALD'S Mills, Market street, corner of Beale, is the oldest and most extensive manfacturing mill in San Francisco. It was established over fourteen years ago, when gold dust was yet the principal portion of our circulating medium, and has always maintained the lead in its peculiar branch of articles manufactured—that of doors, sashes, blinds, mouldings and finishing work for buildings. Mac. puts his own hands to the plow, and is a striking illustration of the old proverb that success will always attend those who attend to their own business. Some idea may be formed of the capital required and the extensive amount of work done at Macdonald's Mills, when we state that some two hundred men are daily employed. Certainly a large capital must be required to carry on such an establishment.

WHAT'S THE MATTER?—In passing through Third street yesterday, we saw crowds of people entering a building a few doors below Market street, and we inquired of a passer-by what's the matter? He answered that they were going to have their pictures taken in the New York Photographic Gallery, and the cause of the rush was that this took the best and cheapest pictures in the city; the inducement must be much to draw so big a crowd from Montgomery and the other streets in the northern part of the city. *

PORTLAND BOILER WORKS.—Moynihan & Aitkin, proprietors. This firm have their whole force employed manufacturing boilers for steamers, Quartz, Flour and Saw Mills. Recently the new boilers for the America were made at these works, and reflect credit on the skill of the proprietors and the competency of their workmen, not only to make boilers, but machinery superior to that manufactured at the East. The Portland Boiler works are on Mission street, between Fremont and Beale streets.

B. C. HORN & Co.—This favorite House, so long celebrated for the superiority of its imported Tobacco and Cigars, have just received the long expected Hibernia Smoking Tobacco, which proves to be the best ever imported. Try it. They are also offering 500,000 cigars at the surprising low rate of $5 per thousand. Everybody can afford to smoke cigars at that rate.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

ON Monday evening Miss Helen Western appeared as "Lady Isabel" and "Madame Vine" in the play of East Lynne, at Maguire's Opera House. She did not add to her reputation in San Francisco by her acting on this occasion, though those who expected to see her tear a passion to tatters, to very rags, were agreeably surprised except in the scene representing the death of "Lady Isabel's" son, where Miss Western did shriek in the most most unartistic manner. Mrs. Sophie Edwin is certainly as yet the best "Lady Isabel" we have seen on the San Francisco stage. We await the arrival of Lucille Western, and even then we have confidence in our California actress being able to hold her own. It is not, perhaps, quite fair to compare newly-arrived Eastern artistes with our California favorites, but I must say that J. A. Herne's impersonation of "Sir Francis Levison" was not nearly so finished a performance as that of Charles Thorne, Jr. The former is almost a rowdy, while the latter was, though brutal, always a gentleman. Mr. Herne had a good benefit on Tuesday and gave general satisfaction by his acting in the character of "Wild Murtough" in Green Bushes, and "Solon Shingle" in the People's Lawyer. The engagement of Miss Helen Western closes to-night. Last night she took a benefit, the play of Captain Kyd was performed. To-night the same piece will be played, and Mr. J. A. Herne will afterward appear in the character of "Toodles." Miss Helen Western and the company at present at the Opera House will take a tour up country on Monday.

The Martinetti troupe conclude their engagement at the Metropolitan to-night. On Monday the theater will be opened under new management with Harry Leslie and Harry Raynor, late of Christy's Minstrels, supported by a good company for the production of American minstrelsy and Burlesque Opera. Everyone must remember with pleasure the minstrel entertainment of Birch and Backus. Messrs. Leslie and Raynor are of the same class of artists, and the company will be organized so as to give a family entertainment abounding with humor, mirth and music, without a taint of grossness; such, in fact, as we used to have in the days when Birch and Wambold sang to crowded and delighted houses.

On Thursday night the last Hawthorne entertainment of the season was given at Union Hall. The comedy of Woodcock's Little Game was performed; the lady who filled the part of Mrs. Larking, far eclipsed all the other ladies and gentlemen taking part in the performance.

On Tuesday the Ciprico Theatrical Association gave an entertainment at Turn Verein Hall. The Lady of Lyons was performed; the lady who exacted "Pauline" was fully up to her part, reading and acting very well.

Mrs. Laura Cuppy will deliver her usual lecture at Mechanics' Hall this evening. These lectures are highly appreciated by all who have heard them.

TOUCHSTONE.

HAYES' PARK.—This favorite resort of pleasure-seekers will offer great attraction to-morrow. The gardens are in splendid order, and numerous amusements are offered. Miss Ella La Rue whose wonderful ascension on a rope last Sunday was witnessed by some 1,200 persons, will to-morrow make another grand ascension and perform her daring feats on the rope. In the course of a few weeks this daring funambuliste will walk from the Cliff House to Seal Rock.

WOODWARD'S GARDENS.—This wonderful piebald doe which has been added to the fine collection of animals at these gardens is the object of general admiration. We will not vouch for the truth of the Times' statement that any Indian who kills a piebald doe is elected chief of his tribe, but can certainly say that this spotted piebald half white deer is a most extraordinary animal.

THE last entertainment given by the "Hawthornes" came off on Thursday evening, at Union Hall. It was the most elegant and recherche affair of the kind that has yet taken place in San Francisco. The audience was large and fashionable; the pieces were rendered in the most admirable style; and the entire entertainment passed off with great eclat.

MARTIN'S RESTAURANT.—This old and popular restaurant was chosen by the British Benevolent Society to get up their dinner last evening, which was served on the upper floor, under the catererership of Louis Dingeon, the proprietor, to numerous members of the Society and their invited guests, without any inconvenience to the many patrons of the restaurant proper. A feat which no other restaurant in the city could do.

NEW GROCERY HOUSE.—J. W. McKee, a well-known pioneer resident of this city, has just opened, in the new block, at No. 31 Kearny street, just below Post, the neatest grocery store in San Francisco, with a stock consisting of the choicest articles obtainable in that line of trade. In compliment to his lady customers, and in compliance to the general fitness of things, Mr. McKee should call his neat store the Ladies' Grocery Store.

NEPTUNE BOILER WORKS.—This establishment is in full tide of business, manufacturing boilers for Quartz, Flour and Saw Mills, a large force is employed outside hammering away at work to complete orders on hand. Duncan Cameron is proprietor of these works, and is well known among the "Iron men" as a first class workman. These works are located at the corner of Mission and Freemont streets.

WE are indebted to J. Ross Browne for a copy of the "Reports Upon the Mineral Resources of the United States, by Special Commissioners J. Ross Browne and James W. Taylor."

A SEA-CHASE.

WE had been lying in Aden Harbor for months, almost "grounding on our beef-bones." All hands were anxious to go out for a cruise, and have a good blow once more; for the sultriness of that land-locked harbor, with the huge peak of Jibbel Shum-shum towering above it on the side of the peninsula, and with the arid desert on the other hand —all access to which was expressly prohibited in "general orders," for the natives were a lawless set of savages, who cut the throat of every one with a white skin—so great, I say, was the sultriness of this God-forsaken harbor, and so depressing the ennui (if it can be allowed to men-of-war's men to suffer from so fashionable a malady) of doing nothing, that when news came from a friendly native quarter that some slavers were moored in Berberah Creek, and in the act of shipping their living freight, a large proportion of whom had just arrived from the far interior, the intelligence was received with welcome by all on board the Honorable Company's ship of war, Rajpoot.

The Rajpoot was a small schooner, not much larger than an ordinary yacht, being about one hundred and fifty tons. She carried an armament of five guns, and a crew, all told, of fifty-three men and officers. How we all stowed away was a miracle in the way of packing; yet, small as she was, I have weathered many a gale in that tight little craft. I have cruised about the Indian Ocean in her in all weathers, and have seen her hammering against a stiff nor'-wester in the Persian Gulf for a fortnight; and all seamen who have sailed on that inland sea will bear me witness when I say that a nor'-wester in the Gulf is what the Yankees would call "a caution" in the way of gales.

I was First Lieutenant of the Rajpoot, though only a youth of twenty; for in the defunct Indian navy, a service which was always short of officers, it was customary to give youngsters acting commissions as Lieutenants. I will not say anything of the captain, who, though a young man to command a ship-of-war, was as smart a seaman as ever trod a deck; or of my messmates, who were my juniors in age, as well as in rank; but proceed to my tale, merely premising that Berberah, the place to which we were bound, is a port on the African coast, distant, with a fair wind, not more than about a couple of days' sail from Aden.

The day after receiving the above news, the order came from the senior naval officer to our captain to make the best of his way to Berberah, and pick up what we could. "Loose sail!" was now the word, and away up the rigging swarmed the "Rajpoots;" and the little schooner was soon under a cloud of canvas, and bowling along with a stiff top-gallant breeze, at her eight knots an hour, for "Afric's arid shore.' Ere night fell, we had lost sight of old Shum-shum, with its little watch-tower and flagstaff hidden in the light fleecy clouds generally crowning the venerable summit of that precipitous mountain. We were not long out of sight of land, however, for early on the following morning the range of hills inland of the town of Berberah became visible. The wind being still fair, we ran round the "spit" which protects the harbor from the sea, and renders it one of the chief ports on that coast; and soon after sunset the little craft cast her anchor, and became the theme of converse and wonderment among the crowds of armed and half-naked Soomaulies, who lined the beach and speculated on the mission that had brought us into their waters. The sails were quickly furled, and then the first cutter was called away by the boatswain's mate; and within five minutes after our anchoring, the boat was pulled away for the shore. I went in charge, and our errand I will now explain.

Moored close to that part of the head of the creek which adjoined the miserable clump of huts dignified by the term of town, were assembled about twenty Arab craft, called by the natives bughlahs. These vessels, we knew, were nothing more nor less than slavers, and we had been given to understand that they had embarked their quota of slaves, preparatory to taking their departure for Hoodeidah and Mocha, in the Red Sea. Berberah is, or rather was, at the time I write, the chief slave-mart on this part of the coast, north of Zanzibar, and did literally a "roaring" business in human flesh. As our advent was doubtless unexpected, we hoped to "puckerow" some of these unhappy wretches, when, besides the pecuniary gain of five pounds head-money per slave, there was the relish of adventure, the spice of danger, and last, but not least in the eyes of honest Jack, who is a tender-hearted soul, the happiness of freeing fellow-creatures (though he called them niggers) from the clutch of cruel masters and infamous procurers.

We expected to see consternation depicted on the countenances of the crews of the bughlahs waiting for our inspection; but, on the contrary, they seemed to take the matter very coolly, and as we approached nearer to them, we observed the black fellows crowding the high poops, and calmly criticising our performance. Was there treachery in this, or what did it mean?

Of all the turbulent, reckless savages in the world, commend me to these same Soomaulies for the possession of these qualities in a highly developed form. They are a cruel and treacherous race, and care for nothing but brute force. Talk to them forever, and they would but laugh at you; but speak to them through the muzzles of your guns, and they will obey with curses, not loud, but deep. So I have ever found them, and so Captains Burton and Speke testify of them. Not many hundreds of yards from this very spot had both those brave gentlemen, but a month or two before, escaped from their cruel hands. On that terrible occasion, poor Stroyan, of our service, was murdered, and often have I heard the late Captain Speke talk of that narrow escape as one of the most exciting in his adventurous life. But we knew whom we had to deal with, and had come fully armed to meet them. Presently the cutter struck against that one of the bughlahs moored at the end of the line. On hailing the vessel, the skipper appeared at the gangway, all smiles, and invited me to come on board and accept a cup of coffee. Followed by the coxswain, a brawny tar, who might have encountered the hug of a grizzly bear on equal terms, with half a dozen of the others, "all good men and true," and armed with swords and pistols, we swarmed up the wall-like side, and climbing through the open ports and over the bulwarks, stood on the deck, and gazed around us.

There were only a few of the native sailors lying about the deck, amusing themselves. Some were eating, some gambling, but the majority sleeping, as your true Oriental always will, whenever he can get a chance. I told the captain I wished to see the hold. Very good, sir, said this official, in good Hindustanee, with a cheerful smile, and led the way below. The hold was empty! There was nothing in it except the water-tanks, which, however, from their size and number, together with certain other signs, showed us that the vessel was unmistakably a slave-ship. But the birds were flown, and we had been outwitted. They must have received intimation of our approach, and had managed to disembark their wretched cargo in time to prevent their capture. It was evident, from the quiet, complacent grin on the face of the native captain, that he enjoyed our discomfiture, though I managed to hide all appearance of disappointment under a careless bearing. I left the vessel, and paid similar visits to some of the other bughlahs, but, of course, with a like result. Of one thing I was satisfied, that the slaves had been shipped, though only to be disembarked again when the little Rajpoot hove in sight. I said nothing, however, regarding that discovery, but returning the obsequious "salaams" of the chiefs by salutations equally polite, I jumped down into my boat, and, certainly not in the best of humors, pulled back to the ship.

On reporting to the captain the unsuccessful result of my evening's work, we were both unanimous in our opinion that it would never do to be thwarted in this manner; we must meet these cunning rascals with their own weapons. In the first place, we felt satisfied that the slaves who were "wanted" were concealed among the multitude of temporary huts erected during the season of the great fair, which was now in full swing; or else were removed to some place of hiding near at hand, so that, immediately our backs were turned, they could be reshipped, either here or at some desert part of the coast previously agreed upon as the rendezvous, and thus find their way into the slave-marts of Arabia.

At length we determined to adopt a ruse. We allowed significant hints to be dropped to the natives who came alongside in their small canoes, ostensibly to sell fish or milk, and who, we knew, would carry back the intelligence to the merchants on shore, that we proposed cruising to the southward to intercept certain bughlahs coming from Zanzibar. About noon on the following day we weighed anchor, and stood out of the creek under a pleasant breeze from the westward. Crowds witnessed our departure from the beach, no doubt congratulating themselves on the defeat of the hated and dreaded "Feringhees." As the short twilight gave place to the shades of night, the range of hills in the background faded into obscurity. Now, then, had come the time for action.

The ship's course was altered again for the town we had just left; in nautical phraseology we "hauled our wind," and stood back for the land. Under cover of the night, all this was of course unseen by our watchful friends, the slave-mongers. The breeze had fallen light; and not far from us lay, almost becalmed, a large native craft with her huge mainsail and small "mizzen" set. Without any noise we lowered a boat. The Second Lieutenant pushed off for the bughlah with instructions to board and take possession of her. Soon a light exhibited for a moment low down her hull, and just above the surface of the calm sea, told us that she had been secured. The two vessels were steered for each other; and about two o'clock in the morning (and not a bit too early, for faint streaks on the horizon warned us of the approach of the harbinger of day) we were alongside the stranger. No time was lost. All our sails were taken in and furled. I may here explain that the Rajpoot, though a schooner, was square-rigged forward, and fore-and-aft-rigged on her mainmast. To prevent the possibility of our mastheads being discerned above the sails of the coaster, we "housed" our fore-top-gallant-mast and main-top-mast; the top-gallant-yard also was sent down on deck, and the flying jib-boom rigged in, and then the Rajpoot was lashed on the seaward side of the bughlah. Her Arab crew were in a state of the most abject terror, and nothing would convince them that we had not the fullest designs on their lives and the miserable cargo of rice and mats they carried.

The bughlah's sails were kept set; and a prize-crew being put in possession, she was steered up the coast. Owing to the currents, we had drifted to the southward of Berberah, and had great fears that our scheme would, after all, end in a failure, for there was not sufficient wind even to keep the two vessels, thus lashed together, in the position abreast of the town in which we had purposely placed ourselves before taking in sail. Our object was to capture the slavers after they had fairly left the harbor, and were standing up the coast to the northward; but if the wind did not freshen sufficiently to drive us along under the canvas carried by our Siamese twin, as we christened her, our plans would be detected, and of course frustrated. All hands were terribly disgusted, and notwithstanding a concerto of whistling from the tars to woo the wind to our sails, the fickle element refused to be charmed.

It was now eight o'clock, and there was still a dead calm; unless a breeze sprung up before noon, it was evident that at the rate we were drifting to the southward, the hull of the man-of-war would be opened to the view of the people on shore; and not only should we be again discomfited, but what was more humiliating, we should be the object of ridicule among the Soomaulie tribes on the coast.

But Dame Fortune at length favored us. About ten o'clock a gentle breeze sprung up—quite sufficient to carry the twin-craft along. This revived our hopes, and we made preparations for a chase as soon as the slavers ventured out of the harbor, now abreast of us.

About two o'clock we were made aware of the fact that, over the low land of the "spit" we could, with the aid of good glasses, make out the naked mast-heads of the vessels moored at the head of the harbor. Now this little forest of masts broke up, and rising to the summits of the bare mast-heads we could distinguish the broad latteen-shaped mainsails as the crews hoisted them slowly up.

Hurrah! the vermin were coming out of their holes. If we could only get them into the open, we had little fear but that we could run some of them to earth. Anxiously we watched the squadron as they slowly crept out of their warren, and showed their noses like timid hares when meditating a run across a piece of open country—a spot which their memory recalls as fatal to many of their species, the scene of the short, agonized race for life ere the cruel greyhounds overtook, and before their eyes rent in pieces, their old companions. It seemed as if the vessels were endowed with life, as, one by one, they gradually drew their bows clear of the furthermost point of the low spit, and not without misgivings committed themselves to the hazzards of a chase from the implacable foe which lay concealed within a mile of them, and like a hound straining at the leash, was counting the moments when the restraining hawser would be "let slip." At length our time had come; and the sailors, who had been lounging over the rail, and longing for the time for action, sprang to their posts with enthusiasm as the order was given: "Up masts and yards, and make sail!"

The Rajpoot was a dashing, rakish-looking craft, and was manned by a smart set of seamen who were worthy of their ship, and were trained to the perfection that discipline and continuous drilling alone can effect. It took little more than five minutes to "fid" the main top and for-top-gallant masts, and to "sway aloft" the top-gallant-yard. In two or three minutes more the sails were all "let fall" together, and "sheeted home;" the hawser binding us to the bughlah was cast adrift, to the intense delight of the lascars of our late consort; and we "forged ahead" just as if that old tub had been at anchor.

And now began the excitement of a chase at sea. The sailors rubbed their hands, and danced with boisterous glee as the "old gal," as they affectionately called her, sent the spray flying over the forecastle in a briny shower, that threw back the rays of the noon-tide sun. The wind had freshened, and was just the one to bring out her sailing qualities. The Rajpoot swept down, hawk-like, on the covey of frightened craft, whose commanders seemed utterly bewildered by her unexpected appearance, to judge by the way in which they handled their commands. Some lowered their sails, as if to deprecate pursuit, and then hoisted them again; some turned back toward the harbor; some continued their course; while others pushed boldly out to sea.

We made straight for the centre of the squadron, and fired a blank cartridge from one of our guns, as an order to them to "heave to." It was disregarded. Sauve qui peut was the watchword among them, although, had they been gifted with an ordinary share of pluck, and shown fight, they might have escaped, for the combined crews stood to ours in the ratio of at least five to one, and, moreover, they all carried guns; but each skipper thought only of his own venture, and so they turned and fled. It certainly showed audacity on the part of the little schooner thus to dash among such a force, for actually some of the buglahs were larger than she was; but often sheer audacity wins the day.

Necessity obliged us to confine our attention to some of the runnaways, for we could not hope to capture all. The captain soon made his choice: there was a greater probability of winning those coy fugitives who had pointed their prows seaward, for there no rocks and shoals could play the part of a stern duenna, and warn us off the fair charmers. We singled three vessels out of the ruck. Every sail that would "draw" was set below and aloft, until the little vessel was almost hid beneath the flowing canvas, which bellied out high above our heads, and stretched along the lower studding-sail booms like the wings of some white bird of the ocean. The invigorating breeze blew from off the land with health-giving power, and jokes were bandied and bets laid as to the amount of the "haul" we should make. It would indeed be a piece of rare good luck if we should succeed in "bagging" all there, but it was quite on the cards. We were gaining on the fugitive craft—of that there could be no doubt. One, two, three hours passed, and we quickly neared the sternmost of them. The boats were made ready for lowering, the crews standing round them, with arms girt round their waists, for sometimes these slave-dealers, maddened by the loss of their projected gains, prefer measuring swords with the hated Feringhees to tamely yielding up to their human cargo.

The thirty-two-pounder pivot-gun was loaded, and the bulwarks lowered down; at a signal, the gun was run out, the vessel "yawned" a little, and a round shot was sent on its message. So true was the aim of the captain of the gun, that the shot went clean through the hugh mainsail. It was a warning not to be denied; the slaver "rounded to," and lowering her main-yard, surrendered at discretion. To let fly the studding-sail-sheets, throw everything aback, and lower the cutter with her crew and Second Lieutenant, was the work of two minutes. The Rajpoot's sails filled again, and we were off once more in pursuit. Well, to cut my yarn short, we brought the other two buglahs to their bearings after a smart chase, and before sunset all three were ours, with prize-crews of ten men on board each. The native sailors were put in irons, to avoid a rescue, for they were to the prize-crews as three to one; and then we "took stock" of our slaves—slaves no longer, but freemen the moment the "cross of red" was unfurled above their heads.

There were one hundred and seven slaves in all, men, women, and children, though chiefly coming under the two latter categories. In company with our prizes we steered our course for Aden; and as the Rajpoot had to accommodate her rate of speed to that of the buglahs, we were a week in making that port. One morning, to the no small astonishment of the merchantmen lying in the harbor, we sailed in, towing our three consorts. I know the officers of H. M. S. Thunderclap were highly amused as the saucy Rajpoot made her appearance, dragging in triumph the three prizes, each as large as herself.—Chambers' Journal.

The Compass.—The compass may be said to have opened to man the dominion of the sea, and to have put him in full possession of the earth, by enabling him to visit every part of it. Flavio Gioia, a citizen of Amalfi, a town of considerable trade in the Kingdom of Naples, was the author of this great discovery, about the year 1302. It has often been the fate of those illustrious benefactors of mankind who have enriched science and improved the arts by their inventions, to derive more reputation than benefit from the happy efforts of their genius. But the lot of Gioia has been still more cruel; though the inattention or ignorance of contemporary historians he has been defrauded even of the fame to which he had such a just title. We receive from them no information with respect to his profession, his character, the precise time when he made this important discovery, or the accidents and inquiries that led to it. Near half a century elapsed from the time of Gioia's discovery before navigators ventured into any seas which they had not been accustomed to frequent.

Love.—One who has suffered and come out strengthened from his encounter with the blind God, prints his experience for the benefit of the young beginners. Love is like the devil, because it torments us; like heaven, because it wraps the soul in bliss; like salt, because it is relishing; like pepper, because it sets us on fire; like sugar, because it is sweet; like a rope, because it is often the death of man; like poison, because it makes us miserable; like a man because here to-day and gone to-morrow; like a woman, because there is no getting rid of it; like a beacon, because it guides us to the wished-for port; like will-o'-the wisp, because it often leads one into a bog; like a fierce courser, because it often runs away with one; like a pony, because it ambles nicely, like one; like the bite of a mad dog, or the kiss of a pretty woman, because they both run us mad; like a goose, because it is silly; in a word, it is like a ghost, because it is like everything and nothing—often talked of, but never seen, touched or understood.

The unhappiest of mortals are those who have more money or more time than they know how to use.

THE CHIGNON.

O! bury me deep, with my waterfall on,
And my bonnet so tiny and gay;
Wrap all my fashionable gewgaws around
This form when it turneth to clay.

For I would astonish, long centuries hence,
The learned explorers of tombs;
I would rival the mummy in interest when
Some future Agassiz comes.

To explain to the wondering children of Then
The puzzling marvels of Now;
O! I'll bother their heads with what's on my own,
If they ever should find me, I vow!

OUR ASTOR HOUSE BREAKFAST.

THE newspapers have had a report, lately, that the Astor House was to go the way of all things down town, in New York, and be converted into profitable but uncomfortable stores. I believe they have contradicted the rumor since, and given the delightful, home-like old hostelry at least three years more of life; but I shall still act upon my original impulse, conceived when I first heard the painful story, and relieve my conscience of a weight it has carried altogether too long, by unburdening myself of a certain incident in the secret history of the sturdy old inn, for the benefit of all concerned and the rest of mankind.

It was in the winter of 1862-3, and I was engaged as army correspondent on a Boston paper of enterprise, vivacity and entire respectability combined. If this description leaves any curious reader in the dark as to the identity of the paper, he will have to turn back to the files in the Atheneum, and see which it was that had the lead in a brilliant though sad account of the battle of Fredericksburg—for it was with that very account in manuscript nearly complete in my pocket that I was traveling post-haste through New York on the occasion which I am about to describe.

I have intimated that I beat all the other newspaper men in the field on this occasion; and the details of how I did it might form material for another story, but there is no room for them in this. After confused, bewildering hours, I hardly know how many, of desperate fighting beginning in high hopes and ending in darkest despair, and on my part of rapid writing, page after page, of my note-book filling up with the diary of the moments on which hung the fate of the army and of the war, as I sat on the steps of the Phillips House, and gazed across the river with my glass between each sentence—at last came the decision for retreat. My good fortune consisted in hearing of this climax of ill-fortune a little in advance of any of the other eager but weary journalists who were sleping near me at the moment. It did not take long to map out my plans; and then a night ride across that dreadful sea of fathomless mud to Aquia Creek, the horrors of which I could not describe if I would, but at the close of which I sold my horse to a Yankee sutler near the wharf for a cup of coffee, five dollars, and a rubber blanket. Perhaps some notion of the ordeal of the ride may be obtained from that fact; for he was a good steed in the beginning, and I owed him gratitude for many hard rides successfully accomplished before, on the Peninsula and in the Valley of Virginia. He never did the newspaper which paid for, and the rider who trusted him a better service than his last; for just as I swallowed the scalding, milkless black coffee which restored my own strength, and just as he sank steaming in the yellow puddle which fronted the sutler's tent, I learned that a hospital transport with some of the wounded of the first day's fighting was at that moment leaving the wharf for Washington.

A quick run brought me on board a minute before the plank was withdrawn; but it took a large share of the money I had about me to persuade a Pennsylvania Dutchman, who happened to be sergeant of the guard, that I was not an able-bodied, demoralized straggler from the front, but one of those unrecognized gentry who conquered a right to go into all forbidden places by the mystic "Press," or when that failed, as now, by the talismanic greenback. The day which followed, as we sped up the Potomac with a groaning, writhing cargo of agony, borne up by patriotism, tended by an agent of the Sanitary Commission and myself, and alternately mutilated and neglected by a drunken surgeon who swore at our interferences as he staggered from a drink in the captain's cabin to a murder on the noisome, crowded deck. Doing what I could, I still found time to attend to the duties of my own profession, and made up a clear, terse, and graphic account of the events on the Rappahannock for telegraphing, besides obtaining the name, regiment and condition of every wounded and dead man on board the steamer. It was late in the afternoon, and, in that drizzly December day, already quite dark, when our slow steamer touched the Sixth street wharf in Washington. I calculated the time before the departure of the New York train to a fraction of a minute, and found I had none to spare—so broke my rule in regard to Washington hackmen, and in a minute or less from the landing, had chartered a carriage with a costly proviso that no other occupant was to be waited for, and was trundling through the mud toward the Avenue.

I was lucky enough to find our resident Washington correspondent in his office, or "bureau," as the boys were absurd enough to call it in their dispatches; and he was keen enough to comprehend the situation in a moment, to inform me that by the difference between army time and Washington clocks I had fifteen minutes less than I supposed, to take my precious dispatch of exclusive intelligence for the telegraph wires with less than a dozen words of explanation, and to send me off to the railroad station at the full speed of my carriage after a halt fabulously brief. His cool alacrity, unperturbed either by newspaper victories or national defeats, quite took away my breath; and it was not till we turned the corner near the station that I remembered that one of the two things I had to say to him was to request the loan of enough money to make me sure of having sufficient to get home with, as my hasty departure from Falmouth and the unexpected draft at the landing had reduced my immediate resources to a very low ebb.

My memory came quite too late to turn back, however, and as we arrived at the station I paid my driver his quickly-earned five dollars with more of a sigh than I had ever wasted over the expenditure of office money before. I had but three fives and some small change left; and as I recalled the price of a Boston ticket, it needed no long process in mental arithmetic to convince me that, hungry as I was, my twenty-four hours journey must be made on very short commons. Poverty sharpens the wits; and this temporary impoverishment sharpened mine, as I ran to the office, to such an extent that I bought a ticket to New York only, instead of for the whole journey, remembering that the price of the through ticket included seventy-five cents for a coach-ride through New York while the distance might be traversed by a street car for one-twelfth of the sum. I jumped on board the starting train not a moment too soon; and my first act, after finding a seat, was to make a thorough survey of the financial situation.

Six dollars were first thrust resolutely out of the way, in an inner compartment of my wallet, for my fare to Boston; and the balance which remained for the purchase of commissary supplies, after several countings over of the fractional currency—than rather a novelty, and fresh and new from the press—amounted to precisely ninety-five cents. Any wild desire which might have existed to expend the whole in the luxury of a berth in a sleeping-car was crushed by the remembrance that the price was one dollar; and I solaced myself with the thought that I was tired enough to sleep soundly and comfortably anywhere. There was a refreshment saloon attached to the night train at that time, but as I knew, from old experience, that the smallest viand on its counter would exhaust my entire resources, I resolved to insult my hunger with an apple, and then smother it in sleep, and so reserve the bulk of my fortune for the next day, when my appetite would be more peremptory and could be more economically satisfied. So I supped stoically on the mealy fruit which the basket of a passing vender supplied, and easily put myself to sleep with variations on a formula something like this:

Apple	05
Horse-car fare in New York	06
Newspaper	05
Breakfast, (coffee, eggs, and buckwheat cakes)	30
Dinner at Springfield, (baked beans and ale)	45
Margin for accidents and contingent expenses	04

My very neat an symmetrical plan was not destined to be carried out beyond the first item; for as I opened my eyes in the ferry boat at Jersey City (I had contrived, in some mysterious way, to effect the change of cars then necessary at Philadelphia without awakening to consciousness beyond that of an unusually hideous dream)—my slow-returning senses were jogged by a vision of charming Sallie Burton of Boston, sitting on the opposite side of the cabin, wrapped up to her eyes in shawls and furs, yet looking as lovely as ever, and—though she must have traveled all night in the same car with myself—as fresh and blooming as when I bade her good-bye the previous summer on the piazza of the Rockland House.

She saw me almost as soon as I discovered her, and the genuine joy and tenderness that mingled in the tones of her startled little "Oh, Robert!" as it blended with my "By Jove! Sallie—" made me feel as if it were the news of a glorious victory instead of that of a tragic defeat that I was carrying home to Boston. I had been wooing the dear girl furiously in those halcyon days at Cohassett, and had just begun to dare to hope of winning her, when the order came from the office sending me post-haste at an hour's notice to join McClellan on the Chicahominy. I had dallied with my fate ever since, dreading to risk my future happiness on a letter, and forcing myself to be content with the sweet dreams of Sallie's face which came to me night after night as I shared the soldier's bivouac, and strove with every nerve to gain that promotion and distinction which should give me a better title to ask her for heart and hand when the day should come. Now her sudden appearance at the very moment when I seemed to have got so near the goal, the evident emotion with which she met me so unexpectedly, seemed like a taste of Paradise.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, MAY 25, 1867.

JUGGLERY AND SPIRITISM.

THE Spiritist imposter, W. T. Church, who was so thoroughly exposed in Louisville, Kentucky, not long ago seems previous to that occurrence to have been highly esteemed as a medium, and to have enjoyed the full confidence of his sect. The exposé at Louisville took place on the 16th or 17th of March last; but prior to that time, and as far back as November 1866, charges of imposture had been brought against him. These, however, were not substantiated by any proofs as complete and decisive as in the Louisville case, where the sudden lighting of half a dozen lucifer matches revealed the juggler in the very act of imposture. Those charges, however, had the effect of eliciting a card signed by thirteen leading Spiritists of Decatur, Illinois, where the earlier suspicions against Church arose, in which card they emphatically endorse him as "one of the most extraordinary mediums in the world," further certifying that "his soul is deeply imbued with the soul-inspiring principles of our beautiful Philosophy."

The signers of the card also state that Church "is really doing a great work in convincing sceptics, as well as giving great comfort" to those who are already believers, and "heartily recommend him to the cordial reception of all who love the heaven-born truths of our beautiful Philosophy," with much more of the peculiar jargon of the sect, to the same purport. Of the means by which the medium afforded so "great comfort" to the souls of the faithful, and demonstrated the "heaven-born truths" etc, the card furnishes a curious and edifying account. Having formed his circle, and placed himself upon a chair, the spiritual exercises proceeded as follows:

"A tape-string of about twelve feet long was passed through the armholes of his vest, being crossed and sewed together in front; thence it was passed several times around each arm, and at the crossing sewed to his coat and underclothes. It was then sewed to the leg of his pants and drawers; thence it was put around the rounds of his chair on each side, and thence extended to the floor and tacked. At every place of attachment, either to his clothes, the chair or floor, it was covered with fresh melted sealingwax and stamped, so that if by any possibility he should get loose, he could not repluce the seal, etc. Under this condition the usual manifestations were had —such as playing on the accordeon, ringing the bells, spirits talking to and handling their friends."

The card containing these particulars is dated "Decatur, Ill., Dec., 1866." The account of Church's exposure, contained in the Louisville Journal of March 19th, 1867, throws some light upon the manner in which these wonderful "manifestations" were produced. Dr. D. R. Jones, of Louisville, who was anxious to "investigate," confided his intentions to a few friends who agreed to aid him in carrying out his plan.

Accordingly, on the evening selected for the "experiment," after the medium had been duly secured, and the lights extinguished as usual, the Doctor, as soon as the manifestations began, slipped off his boots, and stole to the chair where Church should have been sitting. But the chair was vacant. The accordeon, "played by the spirit of a little Swiss girl," was however going, and during the intervals the ghost of "Nimwaukee" an Indian was heard stalking over the floor. The little Swiss occasionally caressed and kissed some favored individuals in the circle, and "Nimwaukee" furnished less gentle physical proofs of his presence, and cracked stale jests in broken English. When the performance was at its height, the Doctor gave the signal agreed upon by whistling, whereupon half a dozen matches were simultaneously lighted, and Church was revealed to the astonished circle, unbound, and nearly naked, in the act of producing the manifestations. The method by which he effected his release was quite simple. His clothes were made much too large for him, and the lights being extinguished, he could slip out of his garments, walk about the room, ring bells, play upon the accordeon and personate Indians, angels, and Swiss girls at pleasure. The performance over, he resumed his clothing, and when his confederate brought in the light, no one would suppose that he had ever moved. "There are many remarkable features in the mediumship of Bro. Church" say the Decatur certificate, "which place the manifestations upon the highest scale attained as yet."

This is an encomium the justice of which we are not inclined to dispute. We cannot so readily concur in the opinion expressed near the end of the document, that "there are few if any such mediums in the world." We are inclined to believe on the contrary that there are a great many of them.

AUTHORITY AND BELIEF.

NOTHING is more characteristic of the class of persons who delight to style themselves "liberal thinkers" than the utter contempt which they exhibit for authority in all matters of opinion. With the presumption that belongs to that stage of intellectual development which lies between utter stupidity and clear insight, and with that conceit of superior knowledge which is the ordinary badge of the smatterer and the sciolist, they not only insist upon "investigating" all subjects independently, but ridicule all belief that is not founded upon such personal investigation.

Nowhere in the world is this class of intellectual demagogues so numerous or so mischievous in their influence as in the United States, because nowhere else is there so general a diffusion of that amount of knowledge and education which causes men to take an interest in "isms" and "ologies," without qualifying them for thorough independent examination of their merits. Men who are not educated at all, cannot be made to concern themselves very seriously about the theories of pseudo philosophers, Spiritists and "free thinkers;" while men who have been thoroughly educated, are in little danger of being deluded by them. It is among the intermediate classes that the voluble expounders of spurious philosophy and impure religions find their readiest dupes. The self-sufficiency that spurns at authority and repels instruction is not so often a characteristic of the uneducated as of the half-educated, of those who having learned just enough to imagine that they know everything, set up for teachers and philosophers, exulting in the privilege of dogmatising for themselves, and for all who are so weak as to accept them as guides.

This flattering appeal to conceit and presumption, the sneer against blind deference to "authority," the invitation to "investigate," extended to those who have neither the time nor the capacity for investigation in the sense in which it is designed to be understood—these are are among the most successful arts of the intellectual demogogne, and wherever we see them practiced upon a popular audience in cases involving the necesity of scientific investigation, the proof of charlatanism is complete.

The truth is, that there are many things which the vast majority of men in the present condition of society do and must believe upon authority, and to teach the contrary is no less mischievous than silly. How many, for example, of those who accept without question the statements of men of science in regard to the distance of the sun from the earth, the period in which the latter traverses its orbit, the relative bulk of the planets, are capable of verifying these statements for themselves, or even of comprehending the reasonings and the processes by which their accuracy is established? When Professor Whitney assures us that Mt. Shasta is so many thousand feet high, we do not withhold our belief on the ground that we have not ourselves measured the base lines and taken the angles, and worked out all the trigonometrical calculations by which the result is reached. In such, and thousands of similiar cases, we believe upon authority, and act reasonably and sensibly in so doing; and it is, to say the least, quite as much out of the question for the masses of mankind to make any really thorough and independent examination of the fundamental questions of philosophy or religion, as it is for them to measure for themselves the heights of mountains or the distances and orbits of the planets.

When such issues as those between Coleridge and Bentham, between Renan and de Pressense, between Hamilton and Mill, or between Compte and Cousin, are to be decided, there is not one in a thousand even of "educated men" in the American sense of the phrase, who is competent to examine and pronounce upon them independently, and the pretence of such examination and decision is in the vast majority of cases, a deplorable and demoralizing farce. Accordingly, that instinctive respect for authority which is a part of our mental constitution, is not to be regarded as a weakness; nor is the man who, in the conflict of opinions, listens with respect to its voice, to be reproached as one who has renounced the prerogative of private judgment, since he merely takes authority into the estimate as one of the elements upon which a decision is to be formed. The blustering assertion of independence of authority on the part of the ignorant, is the mere bravado of thoughtlessness and folly; and the exhortation to "independent investigation" when addressed to those who do not possess the capacity to examine the grounds upon which a judgment must be founded, is simply an artful demagogical appeal.

As a matter of fact, the judgments of the great majority of men are, and must be, to a considerable extent influenced by authority, on a large class of subjects. This is so in art and science, and literature, as well as in matters of belief. Instructed opinion influences popular opinion, and affects where it does not control its verdicts; and those are the happiest and best ordered communities, of which this may be most emphatically affirmed. It is generally a simpler matter to decide upon the qualifications of a teacher, than upon the soundness of what he teaches, as a ship-owner ignorant of navigation may, nevertheless, satisfy himself as to the capacity of the officers to whom he entrusts his vessel.

Nor is there serious danger that deference to authority will be carried too far; least of all does such danger exist in this age and country. Indeed, it has been charged, that our system of government tends to destroy in the minds of the people all respect for what is in the best sense superior, and to stimulate conceit, presumption and hollow pretension. It must at least be considered that in our society as at present constituted, confidence is more apt to outstrip ability than to lag behind it, and that exhortations to the people at large to exercise their own independent judgment upon all subjects whether political, literary, philosophical or religious, without regard to old ideas and settled standards, are not urgently needed. Mr. Nesmith of Oregon, recently declared in the United States Senate that a knowledge of art was not necessary to enable a man with a good eye to judge of the merit of a statue; and if he had proposed to decide a question of the kind by a popular vote, the suffrage being extended to all electors of sound vision, we have no doubt that the suggestion would have been applauded by the majority of his constituents. Upon the whole we think that the alarm of the demagogues and pretenders who seem to dread the wholesome restraints of authority as inimical to their own influence, is groundless; excessive reverence for what is venerable, or undue readiness to waive the exercise of independent judgment in deference to any authority whatever, is assuredly not one of the characteristics of the American, and still less of the Californian mind of this generation.

LOCAL ART NOTES.

KEITH'S latest picture of "Tamalpais," as seen from Angel Island, to which attention has been called by Stoddard's poem, lately published in THE CALIFORNIAN, has been placed by its purchaser at Snow & Roos' for a short time. This water color is noticeable for its fresh and brilliant, yet harmonious and truthful coloring. As our artists have too often given us the pale, faded and sun-dried tints so prevalent in our summer scenery, it is refreshing indeed to find one who renders nature in her pleasantest garb. The distance in this, as in all Mr. Keith's paintings, is finely preserved; and the grand old mountain, over whose sides are rolling huge banks of sea fog, though so remote, loses nothing of its grandeur. One distinctive and pleasing feature of the work of this artist, is his excellent management of foliage which, in its graceful grouping and carefully preserved individuality, shows close study of nature. The picture is far better than the water color by Mitchell, an English artist, which is on exhibition at the same place. Mr. Keith has made rapid strides to an enviable position in his profession, and as the branch of painting in which he has met with such success, is at at last winning its long withheld and well merited appreciation in all quarters, his merits will be less likely now than formerly to escape public attention and reward.

Gutierrez has on exhibition at the same place a remarkable portrait of Consul Godoy, which is by far the best work of its kind we have seen on this coast. Another of his paintings, evidently the likeness of some raven-haired senorita, is painted with great vigor and apparent fidelity, and is a fine specimen of his coloring. The few pictures he has exhibited here show that he has been educated in a good school of art, and would at once give him an elevated position in the most critical art circles. He possesses a very correct eye for drawing, a pure judgment in the choice of colors, and a remarkable facility for giving his subjects an appearance of entire unconsciousness and easy grace. His effects are very striking, yet they appear to have been produced without labor, and though he paints with such fidelity to details that we vainly look for some trivial omission, there is no such painful attention to the minute accessories as to divert the eye from the main subject of his pictures. We understand that Mr. Gutierrez is from the City of Mexico; that the misfortune of being plundered on his journey hither, left him few specimens of his skill for exhibition, and that his stay on this coast is but temporary and preparatory to a tour Eastward and abroad. We regret that our patronage of art is too uncertain to leave a hope of his remaining permanently in San Francisco.

Marple has of late improved very much and gives promise of great excellence. His paintings have shown considerable study and care, but their chief fault has been an unnatural paleness and washed out appearance. One production of his, exhibited at Snow & Roos', representing a scene on Russian River is far in advance of his previous efforts, being painted with a bolder and freer hand and with much better effect, though still too sombre and dull in color. Of his view of the Shephard Quartz Lode we cannot say much; but with such scenery it is hard to make an attractive landscape.

Young has painted a view of Tamalpais, and Kipps a sketch of Helmet Rock. The former shows some promise; the latter very little.

Arriola, who is the most versatile of all, has executed a dashing satire on the prevailing fashion in female head gear. It is painted with animation and freedom, and if it had the artist's usual careful execution in addition to its present spirit would be a very creditable picture.

At Duncan's auction room is a small collection of paintings by Arriola, Denny, Bush and Marple. The best landscapes are Marple's, but few of these do him much credit, for he has shown us in some of his later work that he can do vastly better. From such sales as this it is impossible to judge how generously our people patronize art. When our first artists offer their best handiwork to the public under circumstances favorable to free exhibition and critical examination, we are certain that they will meet with hearty encouragement. They certainly owe it to themselves that such a collection as this we have noticed shall not be dignified with the name of an "Artists' Sale"—and pass as a specimen of what San Francisco artists can do.

Our scanty means of exhibition and private sale do not give our people the opportunity which we believe they would gladly seize to patronize the deserving; and the pride we feel in the work of such excellent and promising artists as Nahl, Keith, Wandesforde, Marple and others, leads us to hope for a speedy public exhibition and sale of their best paintings, if only to test the popular appreciation of their merits.

LOCAL ARCHITECTURAL NOTES.

THE new building for the Merchants' Exchange is now so far advanced toward completion that its outlines and proportions sufficiently indicate its architectual character to admit of intelligent criticism.

While in its general effects, it is, as we had anticipated would be the case, one of the finest fronts in the the city, there are some minor points that produce disappointment.

The main cornice though good in its general proportions is not fashioned after the best of models; the enrichments of the frieze are somewhat overcrowded—bulls heads were never to our liking; and the square fronted modillions are not the most graceful of patterns. The recessed portion of the front, above the lower story, is not so well designed as the center and corners, the window trimmings being flat and unsatisfactory.

The basement of such a structure as this, should, we think, have been more solid in its appearance, and should also have been of granite; but, as is usual, the proprietors have sacrificed architectural effect for the sake of large openings and ample light.

With these exceptions the building shows good taste and ability in its designers. The pinacles over the corners are graceful and pleasing; the tower is imposing though perhaps a trifle too large, and the pilasters with most of the details are well proportioned and well arranged.

Where the architects have used the "orders," they have not abused the antique by abortive attempts at originality as is too often done.

Though not to be compared to the Bank of California for beauty of material and workmanship, it is more creditable as a design, not being so strongly suggestive of buildings elsewhere.

We think we may safely say, that when completed, it will be a credit to its owners and architects and an ornament to the city, which contains no more imposing work of architecture. In the buildings on the corner of Pine and Montgomery, the new color brings out many beauties of detail that were invisible before, though they lack boldness and breadth of treatment; the general effect, however, is good, much better than in many newer structures.

We have not had time to give Trinity Church a careful examination, but we observe the tower has sprouted since we saw it last. We trust a spire may speedily grow from its summit.

X.

The Sorceress of Cordova is the title of a new spectacular drama, composed in Spanish by Don Aurelio Luis Gallardo, a Mexican poet residing in this city, and translated into English by Albert G. Randall, Esq., assisted by S. W. Doggett. The piece was read on the afternoon of the 19th instant to a gathering of the critics and literary men of San Francisco, assembled upon the invitation of the author at Martin's Restaurant. We regret that we were unable to be present on this occasion, but according to the unanimous judgment of those who listened to the reading, the piece possesses rare dramatic and poetical merit. The scene is laid in the capital of Mexico and its environs, and the period is the close of the 16th century.

THE GRASS VALLEY "NATIONAL" devotes a column and a half to a notice of "May Wentworth's" "Poetry of the Pacific," which it says "is meeting with a hearty welcome in this portion of California." The writers mentioned with special commendation by the Grass Valley critic, are Edward Pollock, Lyman A. Goodman, Frank Soule, "Caxton," James Linen, W. A. Kendall, James F. Bowman, Charles Warren Stoddard, C. H. Webb, B. F. Washington, and Ina D. Coolbrith.

"DIGNITY," a sketch by Prentice, will be found on another page of to-day's CALIFORNIAN. For a pungent commentary upon Winwood Reade's strictures upon Du Chailln's "Ashango-Land," see "Literary Gleanings and Gossip" on the fourth page of our present issue."

SIMPKINS' TOUCHING CONFIDENCE IN NEWSPAPER ADVICE.

BY TREM.

"OF course, my dear fellow, I don't mean to say that I pin my faith to any newspaper in particular. I don't believe the political utterances of any paper infallible, but I always have been inclined to follow advice which I found in newspapers, when my common sense told me that it was purely disinterested."

This is what Simpkins said to me the other day. He had previously expressed his appreciation of the power of the Press, and declared that he believed that error was much more effectively attacked by the firing in line of newspapers than by the volleys delivered in column by ponderous volumes.

"I have often been mistaken," continued Simpkins, and have many times had reason to regret the faith I placed in the correctness of many of the scraps of advice which go the rounds of the Press.

I was very young when I read in a newspaper a paragraph which stated that a man to become thoroughly well informed on all subjects, needed only to diligently peruse newspapers, and sneered at "book worms" who painfully and wearily ate their way through dull volumes of history, theology, etc., when they could find the vital essence of these volumes served up in an attractive form in the columns of a daily paper. I appreciated the truth of this statement; and since the day that paragraph fell under my notice I have read but few books. I find as much as I care to read of all new books in the reviews, and in fact have scarcely sufficient leisure to read all of these. I have acquired a fair knowledge of the history of most civilized nations by reading the historical tales published in the Sunday papers. I am by no means deficient in geography, though I owe nearly all my knowledge of that science to the daily papers. I find that to become a good theoretical farmer, it is sufficient to read every week the column headed "The Farm" in several of the papers for which I subscribe. I won't bore you by enumerating all the arts and sciences in which I have become tolerably expert with the sole assistance of the newspapers but will again express my belief that when a man reads his Bible, his Shakspeare, his Elegant Extracts, his Dictionary of Foreign Quotations, and all the daily and weekly papers published in this city, if he only properly digests what he reads, what he doesn't know isn't worth knowing."

I rather liked Simpkins. It was far from unpleasant to find such a radical advocate of the value of the newspaper press. I assured him I was not at all bored, and asked him to continue. He resumed his discourse:

"There is one thing which has shaken my confidence in newspapers. By-the-by, you never write 'Sensible Hints to Young Men,' 'Scraps of Advice,' 'Things Worth Knowing,' 'Cut this out,' and all that sort of thing, do you?"

With considerable indignation I assured Simpkins that I was guiltless of such foul crimes, and added that I had always been under the impression that the publications to which he alluded were written by the inmates of Asylums for Idiots as exercises.

"No?" cried Simpkins, looking grave. "Come, now, that's too bad. I tell you I've tried lots of those dodges. I reasoned that here was the wisdom of ages boiled down, crystalized and used to sweeten the columns of a daily paper. That belief has caused me trouble. I saw the other day that a raw onion eaten just before going to bed would cure lungs overburdened with oppressive and irritating matter, I thought my lungs were a little queer, my wife complained that I wheezed unpleasantly. I ate an onion as big as my fist and went to bed after my wife was asleep. Soon I was awakened by a scream. I asked what was the matter, thought I had awakened her by wheezing, and said so.

"Wheezing!" she cried, "No! Oh! you brute, you've been eating raw onions, I know you have. You wouldn't have done this before we were married."

"Very probably not, my dear," I answered, "and possibly it would not at that period of our lives have been so likely to disturb your slumbers," I told her I did it to stop the wheezing, and begged her pardon, but I had to get up and spend an hour in washing my mouth with eau de cologne. However, I smelled like a pole-cat all next day in spite of the perfume. Now that wasn't fair."

"Oh, that was written for the onion-eating vulgar," I answered. "You ought to have known better."

"So I ought, that's a fact," said Simpkins.

"I once read some moral advice, given in a jocular form," he continued. "It was called 'Recipes for fits.' The funny philosopher said, 'though no doctor, he had some excellent prescriptions for fits.' This was one of them: 'For a fit of idleness, count the tickings of a clock. Do this for one hour, and you will be glad to pull off your coat the next, and work like a negro.' I was frightfully lazy the other day, and I thought I'd give that a trial, for fun. I did so, and in about a quarter of an hour I was asleep and snoring. I did not feel inclined to do any work that day.

Then he said: 'For a fit of ambition, go into a churchyard and read the gravestones. They will tell you the end of ambition. The grave will soon be your bed-chamber, the earth your pillow, corruption your father, and the worm your mother and sister.' That is a cheerful prescription. I so seldom have a fit of ambition that it was some time before I tried it. However, when I did go into the cemetery and read the tombstones I had a great ambition to be lost at sea where it would be impossible to place a tombstone over me, and my mother and sister as the fellow terms the worms, couldn't get at me—I don't believe there are worms in deep water—however, I could stand the worms after death better than I could the inscription on my tombstone. I cannot believe what I have read in the Spiritual papers about spirits upsetting tables and all that sort of thing. If a spirit can smash a mahogany table, half a dozen of them could upset a tombstone, and in that case I believe that there would be iconoclastic associations formed in the "Spirit World," by those who could not rest in consequence of the bad taste displayed in their monuments.

Simpkins was straying from his subject, and I had to recall him by asking, "Have you often put faith in the medical advice given by newspapers?"

"Have I?" exclaimed Simpkins. "I rather think I have, and that I stand here alive to-day is only another proof of the powers of endurance possessed by the human frame. I have not, when afflicted with tooth ache, filled my mouth with water and sat on the stove till it boiled, but I have followed recipes almost as absurd. I read in a newspaper that a man was cured of rheumatism by being struck by lightning. I did not attempt to profit by that as I thought the treatment a little severe. I took a hint from another newspaper paragraph and built an Indian sweat house in a heap of manure in the yard, and nearly lost my life in consequence of my wife who declared I was a lunatic, having it pulled down when I was just approaching the crisis.

I have placed confidence in newspaper advice, I do so still—in a measure—but I have suffered. Six lines in one paper caused me to lose eight hens and three broods of chickens; a quarter of a column on the treatment of children was the cause of my wife leaving me, taking the children with her to her mother's house. It was with difficulty that I prevailed upon her to return. My pet dog fell a victim to a new mode of treatment for the distemper, published in a morning paper of limited circulation. I destroyed my wife's $500 shawl by attempting to remove an ink stain on it with a preparation I had manufactured from a recipe I cut out of a paper—and yet," said Simpkins, appealingly, "I don't think I'm such an awful fool. There are so many useful things in the newspapers, and unless a man experiments a little he will never find out what they are worth."

"That's very true, Simpkins," I replied, "you have."

ITALIAN OPERA.

THE delightful comic opera of Don Pasquale was presented on Friday of last week, to an audience extremely fashionable, though not overcrowded. Signor Eugenio Bellini, who made his first, and thus far his only appearance, as "Don Pasquale," proved himself an excellent buffo, with abundant and appropriate action, great command of facial expression, and a well trained though not very powerful voice. He was received with considerable favor. Signorina Bellini, as "Norina," appeared to better advantage than before, and was warmly encored in Via caro sposino. her persuasive little address to the "Don" after their quarrel. Signor Mancusi's "Doctor Malatesta" was a capital impersonation, and some of the dialogues between him and "Don Pasquale," displaying great rapidity of utterance and high comic talent on both sides, were heartily enjoyed and loudly applauded. Signor Bianchi, as "Ernesto," was sufficiently good, though the character is not exactly in his line. Some of the concerted pieces were remarkably well done, and the whole performance was given with unusual finish and smoothness.

Il Trovatore was repeated on Saturday evening, with great improvement on its first representation. Signorina Brambilla, as "Leonora," was faultless; and Signor Limberti was once more in splendid voice, and acted with great spirit, as "Manrico." The other parts were well done, as before, and the general effect was very satisfactory.

Un Ballo in Maschera, always a favorite opera, drew immense houses on Monday and Wednesday evenings, and was in many respect the most creditable performance yet given by this troupe. It was put upon the stage with less expense than during the last season, and the masquerade scene, in particular, had a meagre and shabby look, not very complimentary to such a brilliant and remunerative audience. The music, however, was rendered throughout with fine effect. Signorina Brambilla was admirable as "Amelia," and Signor Limberti almost equally so as "Ricardo;" Mme. Stella Bonheur's acting was full of significance, and her singing almost faultless as "Ulrica;" and Signor Mancusi was really magnificent as "Renato." The part of the "Page," in which Adelaide Phillips made such a hit, was prettily sung by Signorina Bellini, whose youth and diffidence compel the audience to overlook the excessive tameness in her acting. She will do better after some years' experience; meantime she has our best wishes, and we shall rejoice to see and record her improvement. The chorus and orchestra were generally good, the latter being enlarged, and in the masquerade scene supported by the Second Artillery Band.

La Favorita was produced last night, and will be more fully noticed in our next issue. Il Trovatore will be repeated this evening. I Martiri is announced for Monday.

But the cabin of a ferry boat is hardly the place for outward manifestations of ecstatic sentiment, and I dare say our fellow voyagers across the way overheard our conversation without discovering that either of us was different from ordinary mortals. In the words of somebody or other in Mother Goose's dramas, it was, "How do you do, and how do you do, and how do you do again," and then it was:

"But how in the name of wonder came you here, and where did you come from?"

"Why, I have been to Washington, to see the opening of Congress and visit my cousins, and am on my way home. But how came you here?"

My own story need not be recapitulated; but its main fact, that I was bound to Boston and on the same train with herself elicited an "Oh, how nice," that was the sweetest music and the most exquisite poetry to my ears. Of course I took possession of the satchel, water-proof, checks, ticket and other impedimenta of my fair fellow traveler at once, with the air of a regularly-appointed guardian. A glance at the long series of coupons which formed the ticket, however, reminded me that of course Miss Burton was ticketed through to Boston, and that her natural means of crossing the metropolis was by the lumbering coach which stood before us as we quitted the ferry-boat, and into which an unsavory Irishwoman with half a dozen whimpering children, was already crowding her way.

"Oh, Sallie," said I, with a sudden inspiration, whether of good or evil I have never yet quite decided, "Let us not ride in that disagreeable thing. We can easily walk to Broadway, and take a car, and then we can stop and take breakfast at some better place than those horrible restaurants near the depot."

"Certainly, I had just as lief, if you think it would be pleasanter, Mr. Delton," said she, without a moment's hesitation. "I suppose there is plenty of time, and I am sure I am hungry."

I believe Sallie thought I was moody and offended during that walk through Courtland street, because she had called me by my surname; but I hardly noticed the lapse, for the memory of the state of my pocket, forgotten in the sound sleep and sudden surprise, just then struck me, as it were, between the eyes; and none of the mental arithmetic I could muster could create a satisfactory example with the materials I had at command. Six more cents out of my ninety, for a double car fare, left only seventy-eight for the day's provision for two people, putting the longed-for newspaper out of the question as an unjustifiable luxury! and though such a sum might be an abundance in Pekin, with my knowledge of New York restaurants and railway dining rooms, I could not contrive a practicable way of making the two ends meet.

Some matter-of-fact reader may growl that of course the young lady had money enough, and that all I had to do was to borrow a few dollars of her for a day and be at once relieved of all anxiety. But I think those who have been in the same peculiar condition of mind and heart that I was in then, feeling as I did that a most momentous crisis was near at hand, will admit that such a course of procedure was quite out of the question. I was not sure enough of my fate to venture any risks however slight, and the risk implied to my mind, in confiding to the being who held my happiness in her hands, that I was two hundred miles from home with only ninety cents in available funds, would have been fatal to all my hopes of success.

No; the exigency of the hour demanded a conception and execution almost Napoleonic; and by the time we had reached Broadway I was ready for the test.

"I think, Sallie," said I, as cool as I had seen General Burnside forty-eight hours before, on the hill overlooking Fredericksburg, "I think on the whole we had better breakfast at the Astor House. It is quite near, very comfortable, and you will have a chance to get thoroughly warmed before taking the horse-car."

Sallie called me by my Christian name again as she assented joyfully to the proposal, and the conversation glided off into a track where I need not to follow it. The sun was hardly up, I remember, and none of the stores in that part of Broadway would take down their shutters for an hour or more. The newsmen rushing by with damp bundles of papers, and the hacks driving to and from the early boats and trains were about the only occupants of the street; and Sallie thought it very different from the Broadway she had known in her visits to New York, and worth being out at that unearthly hour to see as a novelty. At length we reached Vesey street, and as we turned the corner I think my heart beat faster that it had ever done in any of the perilous positions of my war experience. Suppose the door of the ladies' entrance should be locked at this early period of the day; or suppose we should be met at the head of the stairs by a polite waiter? In either case I think I should rather have been in even General Burnside's boots than mine that morning. But no untoward incident overthrew my scheme at its beginning; we entered, ran up the stairs, and without meeting an inquisitive eye crossed the hall into the little reception room where a jolly fire already burned in the grate, and gave Sallie an opportunity to doff her overshoes and warm her pretty feet in the most enchanting way imaginable.

Of course I left her, ostensibly to report myself at the office; and of course I did not go near the office, but made a hasty toilet in the wash-room, including renovation to the extent of a clean paper color from the recesses of one of my pockets. I needed the splash of the cold water to dispel the nervousness which kept creeping over me when I thought of the dangers of my position and the immensity of the interests at stake. I think I would have given a slice of my reputation to have met any of my newspaper friends in the family lobby, with five dollars in his pockets; but journalists are not abroad so late in the morning as half-past six, and no such means of relief was to be hoped for. I would have pawned my watch willingly or sold it for one-tenth its value with absolute pleasure; but neither my uncle nor the jewelers open their doors till eight at least. We had time enough, but none to spare; so I braced myself with bold resolution, assumed as much of the air of an established guest as possible, and sauntered back to the reception room where Sallie was waiting in the firelight, leaning her head on her hand in the prettiest attitude of fatigue and meditation in the world. She donned again her outer garments briskly, I shouldered overcoat and minor luggage, and we marched, she as innocent as a lark, and as gay, and I weighed down with apprehension and suspense, into the cosy little breakfast room.

Nobody stepped up to question my right there: the waiter designated a table for us as a matter of course, and evidently took us, as I meant he should, for guests of yesterday, compelled to an early breakfast on account of departure in the morning train. There was one such party in the room already, eating bonneted and shawled and with nervous glances at the clock. The fires glowed in the two grates with a cheerful lustre, and the screens before them, serving also as heaters for the rolls and plates, reminded me of the tin-kitchens of my boyhood days. We had a table to ourselves in one corner. Sallie clapped her hands joyously, and said it was splendid; and we combined to order such a breakfast as might have suggested to the waiter that we were just from a journey, and not just starting out. I remember I sent the waiter off with a bit of currency to buy me a morning's Herald, quite as much to add an air of luxury to our repast as to reassure myself that no New York newspaper man had stolen a march upon me by a balloon or aerial telegraph with an account of the battle. There was only a half column of sensational headings and a few confused lines of contradictory statements vaguely shadowing forth the defeat. My newspaper triumph was certain, and with it I felt assured of a promotion and an established reputation in my profession, which would give me the right to ask Sallie the question to which I fancied her eyes had already said yes.

It was a most bewitching breakfast. With youth and health and love and novelty to season our viands, there was no sickly sentimentalism about our appetites. Mine had the added stimulus of the remembrance of six months' campaign fare in Virginia and Maryland; but I think we both enjoyed the feast about alike, and shared each other's steaks, cutlets, omelets, chicken-wings and successive plates of smoking, luscious cakes, at a merry mood of rivalry and comparison. True, to me it had some of the elements of Macbeth's feast; as a step resounded in the corridor, I fancied my Banquo in the shape of the gentlemanly clerk, coming to ask me to "call at the office and register;" like the Egyptian I had a grinning skull at my banquet in the ebony waiter who might ask me at any moment for the number of my room; and when the closet door opened I conjured up a skelton in the shape of a curt detective who might take me off to the Tombs as a new edition of Jeremy Didler, with my delayed dispatch in my pocket, and Sallie in tears of wrath. With such thoughts constantly popping up, the words of adoration, of entreaty, which kept rising to my lips as I looked across the table at the dainty form opposite, had to be resolutely repressed, for should any of these interruptions occur, I thought how speedily would the tenderness that danced in Sallie's eyes turn to flashing scorn, how dark would be the prospect otherwise so bright before me.

But the meal, with all its delights and all its terrors, came to an end at last; we had still more than half an hour to reach the New Haven station; and I breathed a sigh of relief as the waiter helped me on with my overcoat as obsequiously as if I had been Mr. Astor himself, with a check for a million in my pocket, in place of that wretched ninety cents. I would have given him half my cash as a fee, in my joy, but that I feared to expose the emptiness of my pocket-book. We passed down the stairs unmolested as we had come up, followed by the bona fide departing guests who had breakfasted near us, and who had a carriage waiting for them at the door. We made our way to the horse-car, which at that early hour for up-town travel we had nearly to ourselves, and arrived at Twenty-seventh street in ample time for the eight o'clock Boston train.

It may be imagined that with the weight of my rash experiment off my mind, and Sallie's pretty head occasionally resting on my shoulder, with the horrors of the defeat growing dim, and the consciousness that I had distanced all the press of the east in speed that morning, and should beat them in minuteness and accuracy of detail the next, I soon recovered my natural spirits. I saw no longer any reason for delaying my own attack upon the fortress I had beseiged so long. I opened my first parallel at Bridgeport, began the assault in earnest at New Haven, carried the citadel long before we reached Hartford, and fired a salute of victory in the next tunnel. We mutually celebrated the triumph in another way at Springfield, where a judicious expenditure of my remaining seventy cents procured a lunch of wholesome New England viands quite as liberal in quantity as our hearty breakfast had left us an appetite for. But it was not till long after that that I told Sallie the secret of our Astor House feast, and how when I gave her up temporarily to her father in the depot that night, I walked to the office with hardly money enough to jingle in my pocket.

Of course, in the happy years that have followed, I have felt an occasionally twinge of honorable remorse, as I thought of the contemptible way in which I had swindled the Astor House. I did indeed contemplate explaining the whole affair at the office when I next passed through New York; but when I came to the test, the stately severity of the clerk's manner quite froze me with dismay at the thought of such a confession to such a man, and I only asked him to give me the key of my room. So absurd an idea as sending the amount of which I had defrauded the establishment in an anonymous letter, as people are constantly sending such missives to the Treasury Department, was not to be thought of. I strove to make such reparation as I could by always staying at the house when I visited New York—never again with empty pockets; but then I have reflected that the thorough comfort and homelike atmosphere of the place would have induced this choice in any other circumstances, and so I have decided to ease my conscience by a sort of public confession, and have therefore put faithfully down in black and white the whole story of the first time my wife and I ever breakfasted together at the Astor House.—Boston Saturday Gazette.

Artificial Flowers.—Ladies who deck their hair with mimic bloom, have, in general, little idea of the way in which those false flowers grow. They wear them, light-hearted, in the gayest of scenes, and think not that they are transplanted from the saddest. They put forth their leaves and delicate hues in stifling garrets, in fetid back kitchens, or in hot, overcrowded factories, where the gas-burners are often without glass or shade, and gas-stoves are set on the table to heat the tools, while a hundred women and girls, from nine years old and upwards, bend over their hot-house plants. Some hold the hand stamp, which cuts through sixteen folds at a time of the muslin or silk that is to make the leaves and flowers. Others vein the leaves by pressing them between dies, or paint the petals separately with a brush when the center is to be left white. Most of them are busy with the finer work of constructing the flowers. They gum and wax, dust for bloom with potato flour, or with blown glass powder for frost; they twist paper or silk thread to the stalk, and make the foundation on which the petals stick. Slender wires are run through the blossoms, and a small goffering iron gives them their curl. All this is strange and fidgety work, especially by gas-light, with blistered fingers, thumb-nails worn to the quick, and the dust of paint and other material inflaming the eyes, and preparing patients for the Opthalmic Hospital. The blue and carmines try the sight sadly, and the latter causes heaviness in the head. Arsenic green and verdigris blue are seldom used; but enough is left to poison the poor "flower girl's" existence. She works in London fourteen or fifteen hours a day, and sometimes longer. After thirteen hours' work, girls often take home sufficient for two hours more.

The Best.—Mr. Charles S. Westcott, of Elizabeth, N. J. who is well acquainted with the leading sewing machines, states: "I think the Grover & Baker is best adapted to family use, for the reason that it is the most easily kept in order, and makes a stitch which does not wear itself in two by the direct strain of the threads upon each other. I have had a shuttle or lock-stitch machine in use in my family, and abandoned it because it was more difficult for a woman to keep it in order, and because the seam made by it would in a short time rip in separate places by the wearing of the threads upon each other."

Carlotta Patti has increased in favor with the musical people abroad. Ullman has commenced a second tour with her. The first concert, in Nemes, brought in over six thousand francs. If she were not lame, she would be very successful in opera. The artificial application to hide her deformity does not work well.

ABSCONDED!—The wife whose husband supposed she had absconded was freely forgiven, when he found she had only been down to the NEW YORK PHOTOGRAPH GALLERY to see HOWLAND, and get one dozen of those beautiful Card Pictures, THE BEST ever made in this city. Come early, if you want to get a sitting. Remember the Place—Nos. 25 and 27 Third street, east side, near Market street. B. F. HOWLAND, Artist.

MAYER'S BAZAAR.—R. Mayer offers at his Bazaar, corner Pine and Montgomery streets, the greatest variety of jewelry, watches, silver plated ware, guitars, music boxes; concertinas, accordeons, opera glasses, etc., etc., to the public of San Francisco, and to the country trade, at prices that defy competition, and is determined to close out his present stock at greatly reduced rates. His heavy case silver watches from the American Watch Company are superior to anything ever before offered to the public. These watches are taking the place of heavy gold watches from the fact that the workmanship is superior, the casings pure silver, and the prices low. The sale of these watches is very extensive on the Pacific coast. Another proof that American manufactures can beat the world. The works are made of platina and never get out of repair. French opera glasses of great power for sale or hire, and all kinds of musical instruments, eight day family clocks, etc. This is a rare chance to invest your money to advantage, at Mayer's Bazaar, southeast corner of Montgomery and Pine streets.

N. B.—An immense assortment of Japanese curiosities for sale.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

DIDN'T KNOW.

He gave me a knife one day at school,
Four-bladed, the handle of pearl—
And great black words on the wrapper said
"For the darlingest little girl."
I was glad! Oh, yes, the crimson blood
To my young cheek came and went,
And my heart thumped wondronsly pit-a-pat,
Bnt I didn't know what it meant.

One night he said I must jnmp on his sled,
For the snow was falling fast;
I was half-afraid, bnt he coaxed and coaxed,
And got me on at last.
Laughing and chatting in merry glee,
To my home his conrse he bent,
And my sisters looked at each other and smiled,
But I didn't know what it meant.

The years passed on, and they touched his eye
With a shadow of deeper blue;
They gave to his form a manlier grace—
To his cheek a swarthier hue.
We stood by the dreamily rippling brook,
When the day was almost spent,
His whispers were soft as the lullaby;
And——NOW I KNOW WHAT IT MEANT!

MIND AND MUSCLE.—Brown, who has been editing a weekly paper at a small town in an adjoining State for some time past, went through here a few days ago, on his way to New Orleans in search of employment. Smith met him in the reading-room of the hotel just before he left here, and asked him how he happened to abandon his paper.

"You see," said Brown, "Green and I started the thing in copartnership, and as he is nothing of a writer, it was agreed between us that I should edit the paper, and he shonld do the press-work, etc. This arrangement struck me after a while as being unfair, so I said to Green one day, "Green, I don't like the way the work in this office is divided. I think that inasmnch as you merely work with your muscle, while I work with my brain, yon ought to allow me a little bigger share of the profits. Brains onght always to command a higher price than muscle."

"All that may be true," said Green, "bnt look here, Brown, considering the large amount of muscle I've got and the very small amount of brains you've got, I don't think you have any right to say a —— word."

"After that," continued Brown, "I felt that in justice to myself I couldn't associate on equal terms with Green any longer, and so I sold ont my interest in the concern and left."

THE editor of the Woonsocket Patriot makes merry over the mistake of an old Shanghai hen of his that had been "setting" for five weeks upon two round stones and a brick! "Her anxiety," quoth he "is no greater than ours, to know what she will hatch. If it proves a brickyard, that hen is not for sale."

"I LOVE to look upon a yonng man. There is a hidden potency concealed within his breast which charms and pains me." The daughter of a clergyman happening to find the above sentence at the close of her father's manuscript, as he had left it in his study, sat down and added: "Them's my sentiments exactly, papa, excepting the 'pains.'"

ALMOST every young lady is public spirited enough to have her father's house used as a court house.

FEW ladies are so modest as to refuse to sit in the lap of luxnry.

BROADWAY.

"'The shadows lay along Broadway,
'Twas near the twilight tide,
And slowly there, a lady fair,
Was walking in her pride.
Alone walk'd she, but viewlessly
Walk'd spirits by her side.

"'Peace charm'd the street beneath her feet,
And honor charm'd the air,
And all astir look'd kind on her,
And call'd her good as fair;
For all God ever gave to her
She kept with chary care.

"'She kept with care her beauties rare,
From lovers warm and true,
For her heart was cold to all but gold,
And the rich came not to woo;
But honored well are charms to sell,
If priests the selling do.

"'Now walking there was one more fair,
A slight girl, lily pale,
And she had unseen company
To make the spirit quail—
'Twixt want and scorn she walked forlorn,
And nothing could avail.

"'No mercy now can clear her brow,
For this world's peace to pray;
For as love's wild prayer dissolved in air,
Her woman's heart gave way:—
But the sin, forgiven by Christ in heaven,
By man is curst alway.'"

—N. P. Willis.

A correspondent in Skull Valley, Arizona mentions a scene that occurred in a village in Illinois, where dwells a magistrate named Helser. The minister of the village one day received a call from a soldier and a blushing maid, who wished to be married at once. On being asked for the marriage license, the "boy in blue" declared he had none, and, moreover, that he needed none, as he had known the girl for four years and they liked each other, and didn't want license or permission from any one. The clergyman assured him that without a license he could not perform the ceremony. The lover entreated, without avail, when the parson rather impatiently remarked: "You had better take this girl and go to Helser." "Go to —— yourself, sir!" was the reply; and the couple indignantly "evaded the premises," with the conviction that profanity was not by an means confined to the army.

Obituary Notice.—Dyed—in this village, on the 29th of March, the whiskers of "Jim Woodcock." They had long been an ornament in the circle in which they had moved; but their roseate hue hath departed, and, instead, they present a hue of unearthly blackness, which color is rapidly changing to a purple, mingled with a lovely lilac. "Happy are those who dye young."

Prefer solid sense to wit; never study to be diverted without being useful; let no jest intrude upon your good manners, nor say anything that may offend modesty or heedlessly hurt the feelings of another. When you have attained this height of philosophic virtue, you will be fit for Heaven—and the sooner you go there the better your associates will like it.

The way to get a good wife—get a good girl and go to a parson.

AYER'S SARSAPARILLA

IS A CONCENTRATED EXTRACT OF THE CHOICE root, so combined with other substances of still greater alterative power as to afford an effectual antidote for diseases Sarsaparilla is reputed to cure. Such a remedy is surely wanted by those who suffer from strumous complaints, and that one which will accomplish their cure must prove, as this has, of immense service to this large class of our afflicted fellow-citizens. How completely this compound will do it has been proven by experiment on many of the worst cases to be found in the following complaints:

Scrofula, Scrofulous Swellings and Sores, Skin Diseases, Pimples, Pustules, Blotches, Eruptions, St. Anthony's Fire, Rose or Erysipelas, Tetter or Salt Rheum, Ringworm, Scald Head, etc

Syphilis or Venereal Disease is expelled from the system by the prolonged use of this Sarsaparilla, and the patient is left in comparative health.

Female diseases are caused by Scrofula in the blood, and are often soon cured by this Extract of Sarsaparilla.

Do not discard this invaluable medicine, because you have been imposed upon by sometbing pretending to be Sarsaparilla, while it was not. When you have used Ayer's—then, and not till then, will you know the virtues of Sarsaparilla. For minute particulars of the diseases it cures, we refer you to Ayer's American Almanac, which the agent below named will furnish gratis to all who call for it.

Ayer's Cathartic Pills, for the cure of Costiveness, Jaundice, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Dysentery, Foul Stomach, Headache, Piles, Rheumatism, Heartburn arising from Disordered Stomach, Pain, or Morbid Inaction of the Bowels, Flatulency, Loss of Appetite, Liver Complaint, Dropsy, Worms, Gout, Neuralgia, and for a Dinner Pill.

They are sugar coated, so that the most sensitive can take them pleasantly, and they are the best Aperient in the world for all the purposes of a Family Physic.

LOVED TOO LATE.

Far off in the dim and desolate Past—
That shoreless and sorrowful sea
Where wrecks are driven by the wave and blast,
Shattered, sunken and lost at last,
Lies the heart that was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Long ago broken for me!

My loves were Glory and Pride and Art—
Ah, daugeroas rivals three!
Sweet lips might quiver and warm tears start
Should an artist panse for a woman's heart—
Even that which was broken for me!
Poor heart!
Too rare to be broken for me!

Oh, she was more mild than the summer wind,
More fair than the lillies he!
More true than the star with twilight twinned
Was the spirit against whose love I sinned—
The heart that was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Cruelly broken for me!

I told her an artist should wed his art—
That only his love should be;
No other should lure me from mine apart,
I said; and my cold words chilled her heart,
The heart that was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Hopelessly broken for me!

I spoke of the beautiful years to come,
In the lands beyond the sea—
Those years which must be so wearisome
To her; but patient lips were dumb;
In silence it broke for me!
Poor heart!
Broke, yet complained not, for me!

I pressed her hand, and rebuked her tears
Lightlessly and carelessly;
I said my triumphs should reach her ears,
And left alone with dismal years
And the heart that was breaking for me—
Poor heart!
Silently breaking for me!

My days were a dream of summer time
My life was a victory;
Fame wove bright garlands to crown my prime,
And I half forgot in that radiant clime,
The heart that was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Patiently breaking for me!

But my whole life seemed, as the swift years rolled,
More hollow and vain to be;
Fame's bosom at best is hard and cold—
Oh, I would have given all praise and gold
For the heart that was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Thanklessly broken for me!

Sick with long, hope and dread
I hurried across the sea;
She had wasted as though with grief, they said—
Poor child, poor child!—and was long since dead;
Ah! dead for the love of me—
Poor heart!
Broken, and vainly, for me!

Weighed down by a load too heavy to hold,
She died murmuringly;
And I, remorseful and unconsoled,
I dream of the wasted days of old,
And of the heart that was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Broken so vainly for me!

And my soul cried out in bitter pain
For the bliss that cannot be—
For the love that never can come again,
For the sweet young life that was lived in vain,
And the heart that was broken for me—
Poor heart!
Broken and buried for me!

AYER'S SARSAPARILLA

IS A CONCENTRATED EXTRACT OF THE CHOICE root, so combined with other substances of still greater alterative power as to afford an effectual antidote for diseases Sarsaparilla is reputed to cure. Such a remedy is surely wanted by those who suffer from strumous complaints, and that one which will accomplish their cure must prove, as this has, of immense service to this large class of our afflicted fellow-citizens. How completely this compound will do it has been proven by experiment on many of the worst cases to be found in the following complaints:

Scrofula, Scrofulous Swellings and Sores, Skin Diseases, Pimples, Pustules, Blotches, Eruptions, St. Aathony's Fire, Rose or Erysipelas, Tetter or Salt Rheum, Ringworm, Scald Head, etc

Syphilis or Venereal Disease is expelled from the system by the prolonged use of this SARSAPARILLA, and the patient is left in comparative health.

Female diseases are caused by Scrofula in the blood, and are often soon cured by this EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA.

Do not discard this invaluable medicine, because you have been imposed upon by something pretending to be Sarsaparilla, while it was not. When you have used AYER'S—then, and not till then, will you know the virtues of Sarsaparilla. For minute particulars of the diseases it cures, we refer you to Ayer's American Almanac, which the agent below named will furnish gratis to all who call for it.

AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS, for the cure of Costiveness, Jaundice, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Dysentery, Foul Stomach, Headache, Piles, Rheumatism, Heartburn arising from Disordered Stomach, Pain, or Morbid Inaction of the Bowels, Flatulency, Loss of Appetite Liver Complaint, Dropsy, Worms, Gout, Neuralgia, and for a Dinner Pill.

They are sugar coated, so that the most sensitive can take them pleasantly, and they are the best Aperient in the world for all the purposes of a Family Physic.

EDWARD J. QUIRK, Plaintiff, vs. JAMES P. HORBACH, et als., Defendants

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the said city and county of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES P. HORBACH, HENRY DELVENDAHL, HENRY BREMMERMAN, ERNST JANSSEN and GUSTAV HELMKE, Defendants:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this District, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to require you, the said defendants, to set forth the nature of your respective claims to that certain lot or parcel of land situate in said city and county of San Francisco, as particularly described in the complaint herein, being subdivision No. 5 of the 100 vara lot known on the map of the city of San Francisco as No. 276, as designated on a plat of the original subdivision thereof, recorded in the office of the County Recorder of said city and County, in Liber 1 of Certified Grants, at page 156, that all adverse claims of said defendants and each of them may be determined hy a decree of this Court; that hy said decree it be declared and adjudged that the said defendants, each and all of them, have no estate or interest whatever in or to said parcel of land, and that the title of plaintiff thereto is good and valid; that said defendants, and each of them, he forever debarred from asserting any claim whatever in and to said land adverse to plaintiff, and for such other and further relief as to this Hon. Court shall seem meet and agreeable to equity, with costs of suit against such of the defendants as shall defend this action.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, this 25th day of February; in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven.

SIEGMUND T. MEYER and ASHER T. MEYER, Plaintiffs, vs. LINA A. SON, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Fourth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to LINA A. SON, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fourth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, (a copy of which accompanies this summons) within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to recover the sum of two thousand nine hundred and ninety-one and 85-100 dollars, alleged to be due from you to the plaintiffs on a judgment recovered by said plaintiffs against you, and more particularly described in the complaint herein, together with costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified, that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said Plaintiffs will take judgment against you for said sum and costs of suit.

Given under my Hand and the seal of the District Court of the Fourth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this nineteenth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven

Order to show cause why order of distribution should not be made.

On reading and filing the petition of William A. Jenner, the Executor of the last will and testament of Ellen Jenner, deceased, setting forth that he has filed his final account of his administration of the estate of said deceased, in this Court, and that the same has been duly settled and allowed; that all the debts and expenses of administration have been duly paid; and that a portion of said estate remains to be distributed to the heirs and devisees of said deceased, and praying among other things for an order of distribution of the residue of said estate among the persons entitled:

It is ordered, That all persons interested in the Estate of the said Ellen Jenner, deceased, be and appear before the Probate Court of the City and County of San Francisco, at the court-room of said court, in the City Hall in said city and county, on MONDAY, the 3d day of June, A. D. 1867, at 11 o'clock, A. M., then and there to show cause why an order of distribution should not be made of the residue of said Estate among the heirs and devisees of the said Ellen Jenner, deceased, according to law.

It is further ordered that a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks before the said third day of June, A. D. 1867, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in the said city and county.

M. C. BLAKE, Probate Judge.
Dated April 23d, A. D. 1867.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

TO

Purify the Blood.

NOT A FEW OF THE WORST DISORDERS THAT afflict mankind arise from the corruption that accumulates in the blood. Of all the discoveries that have been made to purge it out, none have been found which could equal in effect AYER'S COMPOUND EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. It cleanses and renovates the blood, instills the vigor of health into the system and purges out the humors which make disease. It stimulates the healthy functions of the body, and expels the disorders that grow and rankle in the blood. Its extraordinary virtues are not yet widely known, but, when they are, it will no longer be a question what remedy to employ in the great variety of afflicting diseases that require an alterative remedy. Such a remedy, that could be relied on, has long been sought for, and now, for the first time, the public have one on which they can depend. Our space here does not admit certificates to show its effects But the trial of a single bottle will show to the sick that it has virtues surpassing anything they have ever taken. Sufferers from Scrofula, Scrofulous Swellings and Sores, try it and see the rapidity with which it cures. Skin Diseases, Pimples, Pustules, Blotches, Eruptions, etc., are soon cleaned out of the system.

St. Anthony's Fire, Rose or Erysipelas, Tetter or Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Ringworm, etc., should not be borne while they can be so speedily cured by AYER'S SARSAPARILLA.

Syphilis or Venereal Disease is expelled from the system by the prolonged use of this SARSAPARILLA, and the patient is left as healthy as if he never had the disease.

Female Diseases are caused by Scrofula in the blood, and are generally soon cured by this EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. Price $1 per bottle, or 6 bottles for $5.

For all the purposes of a family physic, take AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS, which are everywhere known to be the best purgative that is offered to the American People.

Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass., and sold by all Druggists and dealers in medicine everywhere.

THE LION'S MOUTH.

"THE gravest beast is an ass, the gravest bird is an owl, the gravest fish is an oyster, and the gravest man is a fool." SYDNEY SMITH.

"I WILL roar, that I will do any man's heart good to hear me." A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

"I WILL aggravate my voice so, that I will roar you as gently as any sucking dove; I will roar you an 't were any nightingale." IBID.

"Nil falsi audeat, nil veri non audeat dicere." CICERO.

The "Bulletin's" "Lady" Correspondent in Paris.

The last letter from the woman whom the Bulletin has engaged to write an account of the Paris Exposition is not worthy of admission into the columns of so respectable a paper. She complains of the unfinished condition of the building on April 11th, and hopes that the finishing touch will soon be given to it. She then says:

"Mi trops embrasse mal e'trente is an old saw the Commissioners, in their ambition to give the stamp of universality to their undertaking, have done well to bear in mind."

It is hard to say which is the most incomprehensible in the above paragraph, the French (?) or the English. Then this correspondent, referring to the English Exhibition, says:

"I so well remember how Queen Victoria, leaning on Prince Albert's arm, and holding by the hand a little boy dressed in Highland costume, (who has since developed into a graceless man,) was able without running the risk of a sore throat, to expose her royal neck and shoulders to the eyes of the enthusiastic multitude. No blinding column of dust forced her to shut her honest blue eyes," etc.

As the Prince of Wales is at the present time engaged in filling the duties which properly belong to the lady with the honest blue eyes, and has done nothing as yet to make the people of England consider him "graceless," the statement of the female correspondent of the Bulletin must be taken cum grano salis. Near the end of her letter the correspondent rather backs down on the lady with the blue eyes, saying with reference to a model of the mausoleum erected to the Prince Consort.

"When I saw this monument of her grief, I doubted of the truth of the history of her adventures with John Brown, the faithful Gillie to whom it is said she is about to be privately married."

This is the true old gossip's style: "I don't believe Mrs. Smith did so and so; she is really such a good woman I almost doubt it; but yet, who knows?" This lady correspondent picked up a "sea captain" at the Exposition, and struck him for a breakfast. She says:

"A Russian peasant, speaking French with a Parisian accent, gave me a plate caviar for 40 cents. It was very palatable but not nice to look at."

It is really kind of this person to inform the public of San Francisco that caviar is "very palatable, but not nice to look at," and that the poor sea captain had to pay 40 cents for her plate. In the criticism on the paintings, we are told that the "pre-Raphaélites' pretentious eccentricities are extraordinary." We must say that the pretentious eccentricities of this female correspondent of the Bulletin—if it is a female—are very extraordinary. She is constrained by no laws of decency, grammar, or the courtesy due to foreign languages.

Edwin James on Bankruptcy.

Edwin James has written a book entitled:

"The Bankrupt Law of the United States, 1867. With Notes, and a Collection of American and English Decisions upon the Principles and Practice of the Law of Bankruptcy."

Mr. James says in his preface:

"Some experience as a legislator upon this subject, and many years practice in the English courts of bankruptcy, have induced the author to undertake the work."

This distinguished English lawyer might have entitled his work "The Bankrupt Law, by a Bankrupt." Mr. James would have to legislate considerably before he could get the privilege of passing through "the English courts of bankruptcy." He would probably have the pleasure of spending the remainder of his life in a debtor's prison if he returned to England, where his liabilities amount to somewhere about a hundred thousand dollars.

Comfort for the Hungry.

The Dayton Empire says that Mr. Brown has lived fifty-four days without food. Read this ye complaining ones who strive to borrow four bits on the grounds that ye have not had a square meal for two days! If Mr. Brown of Dayton can live fifty four days without food, why cannot ye do likewise? Oh, ye of little faith! Ye have never tried. Only try the experiment instead of filling out your poor perishable bodies directly they become a little shrivelled. Think of Mr. Brown! What man has done, man may do again.

Prevention of Cruelty to Animals—Difficulty of Organization.

There was a talk the other day among the animals at the North Beach Menagerie relative to this matter. From the City Pound there had come a delegation consisting of two escaped curs to confer with the North Beach people. Some organization was said to be necessary for protection against man. There being a dearth of spectators, the meeting was called to order. It was proposed to appoint a President.

"I ought to be President," said the ring-tailed monkey, swinging himself to and fro. Many monkeys have been Presidents of different organizations and societies. I need the office. It will keep me out of mischief. If I am not President I shall make trouble.

"You, a President," growled the grizzly. Dignity is needed for that office. I need not say where that is to be found.

The parrot also put forth some claims on the ground of possessing superior oratorical powers.

The coon who had been uneasily walking backward and forward, saw his opportunity, and objected to feathered bipeds having any voice in the meeting. "They were not animals," said he. "This proposed organization was for the benefit of animals. Birds were not animals."

Then there arose a great hubbub of dispute and contradiction. The monkey and the fox rejoiced and sided with the parrot. They wanted the feathered vote. The fox had his eyes on the Vice Presidency.

The discussion occupied two days. It was finally decided against the birds, on the ground of their being bipeds. There was a prejudice against bipeds, man, their great enemy, being a biped. So it was decided that none were entitled to the benefits of the proposed organization, but those who went on all-fours. The monkey after this took good care to walk on four feet, and even the grizzly stood not erect as formerly. How grovelling is selfish ambition. Yet the chances of both were lessened for the Pesidency. It was a master strike of policy on the part of the coon to lessen the bear's and monkey's political prospects. He did not see, however, that his own were not a bit improved. Organization was more difficult than ever.

During all this time the escaped curs had nearly starved to death while patiently waiting for the appointment of a committee to whom they might present their credentials and be received as members of the convention. Tired of the necessary delay, they started back to the pound. On their way thither they were again captured by the municipal dogerrillas, and arrived at their old quarters just in time to be drowned with twenty-five other unfortunates.

Reform.

Thousands of our citizens, influential and otherwise, patiently suffering the unfortunate organ-grinder, who leaves no portion of this city unmolested, whose terrible and increasing repetition of "Dixie" and other airs doomed by him or his instrument to an eternal torture, is wearing many weak and sensitive organizations into their graves, Thousands of our citizens, we say, would eagerly join in a benevolent enterprise having for its object either the retirement of this peripatetic but mechanical votary of Apollo from public life, or the purchase of a new organ. It is no wonder with this terrible instrument in our midst that the public are so fickle in their encouragement of Italian Opera, or that the discovery of deceased infants under sidewalks and woodpiles is a matter of such common occurrence.

Another desideratum is the procuring of a clean if not new suit of clothes for the one-legged Italian beggar, whose wonderful patience in maintaining his position at that corner, strikes the reflective and observing beholder with admiration. Don't you know the man? He of the bald head, two crutches, one leg, benevolent countenance of beseeching air, observing you as you pass with an expression which, as you approach him, seems to say, "This man is charitable. He will give." And then, when you go on, his leathery facial muscles exclaim, turning to the next passer-by "No. He is like the rest of the cold, cold world." We pity our Italian brother's indigence, but his double-distilled untidiness is distressing.

The man who bawls eulogiums on four dollar boots, cheap shirts, socks, etc., near the corner of Clay and Montgomery, should either be entirely abolished, or turned into a revival preacher, or political stump orator. We mean the man whose voice is characterized by a deep and hollow baseness, suggestive to people of a consumptive habit of body and strong imagination of expectoration of blood, consequent upon such a tremendous wear of lungs. It shameful that so base a voice should be wasted on such base wares.

How Kind.

Last Monday's Times frankly and stupidly made the acknowledgment that that journal "had not in all respects reflected the views of its proprietors." This admission does not certainly reflect much credit on the management of a "First Class Daily." And the Bulletin, while patronizingly extending the hand of welcome to the Times, of course repeats the dying confession of that paper just to keep the public reminded of the inefficiency and inability characterizing its course. So does Mrs. Grundy sometimes damn her victims with a sort of sympathetic censure, saying, "Mrs. Jones acknowledged to me her folly, poor woman. She says herself, she is a dolt and a stupid, but you know that is no new thing to us.

A Common-Sense Boston Legislator.

On April 27th a debate occurred in the House of the State of Massachusetts on the resolution granting $10,000 to Professor Agassiz's Museum. Mr. Branning, of Lee, strenuously opposed the passing of the resolution. He didn't believe in the museum. It was of no practical use to the common people; no students were educated there, and nobody went there but the Legislature once a year. It was a place for the storage of pickled snakes, periwinkles, dead fish, and such trash. He believed that the old fossils who were interested in this museum were better able to pay its bills, than was the State. Mr. Mason, who replied to Mr. Branning, said, shaking his finger at him, that he should, at least, be thankful that this great man had demonstrated to his friend that he (Mr. Branning) and those who came before him did not come from the gorilla. Was Mr. Branning, the common-sense man who did not believe in storing up pickled snakes, periwinkles, dead fish, and such trash to be put down this? No! He replied that "he did not require this; his Maker had given him common sense enough to tell him that he was the creation of his hand!" All honor to Mr. Branning, who possessed such very common sense! He didn't care for the other member's sense which had been cultivated, he liked the good common article. He is the sort of man who would prefer pork and beans to truffled turkey, and would consider that what was good enough for him was good enough for any other man in the world. That's the right sort of talk. Bring these fellows who have better sense than their neighbors down to common-sense. Alas! The resolution granting $10,000 to Professor Agassiz to defray the expense of pickling snakes and other trash, was passed by a vote of 106 to 6. There is much *un*common sense in the Boston Legislature.

Persecution of the Jews.

In New York a Jew butcher has been arrested and bound over under $500 bail for cruelty to animals, by cutting the throat of a bullock instead of first knocking him on the head. The rites of the Jews forbid them to kill animals in any other way, and they will strenuously oppose this new order of things, which they claim is an infringement upon them in a religious point.

It may be justifiable, although all religionists are supposed to have equal rights in the United States to compell everyone to observe Sunday in the manner prescribed by the Scotch and English Churches. When, however, the Jews are debarred from making money on Sunday, as well as on the Sabbath, and have to spend two days of the week in grief and lamentation, we think it is a little too rough on them to prevent them from killing their bullocks as they please. If a little more than necessary suffering on the part of one thousand bullocks aids in saving one Jewish soul from hell, have the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals any right to interfere? We trow not. The rites of the Jews forbid them to kill bullocks in any other manner than by cutting their throats, and are they to be forced to risk their souls because New Yorkers do not understand their religion? There has been too much persecution of the Jews. It is time that it should be put a stop to. They should be protected from the persecution of the New York Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and the New York Insurance Companies. Is it possible that New York wishes to drive them to California?

An Observation.

In the physical world there is but little territory left to discover, but there are vast multitudes who have yet to find that they won their own souls.

Anger in many instances arises from a cowardly fear of seeing or being told our own faults. When apparently enraged at others we are really enraged with ourselves for being enraged at all. For further confirmation consult your own soul after a fit of passion.

Unceasing regrets for past transgressions are as useless as the conduct of one who, having passed over a weary desert, insists on turning back and again needlessly traversing the same route.

The last two inferences are the result of one hour of meditation after an accusation of theft of newspapers; said accusation being partly true.

A "Flash" Religion.

The Dramatic Chronicle remarks:

"The Sunday papers continue their intelligent supervision of the metropolitan pulpit. Can't they furnish us with the programme of a new and "flash" style of religion suited to the taste and capacity of their readers?"

Perhaps Bro. Todd, the apostle of "Our beautiful and philosopic Faith," might render assistance in getting up the new style of religion needed.

The Flag.

Since its resuscitation the Flag evinces new vigor. It is a double turreted monitor among the old hulks. Something must be done to save the sinking fleet, against which its shots are directed with such terrible effect. McDonald's foot is once more upon his native heath. He wields a keen blade, inflicting thrust upon thrust on his slow and pompous adversaries, overburthened by the cumbersome armor of bogus dignity and worn out conventionality.

More Jugglers.

Another company of Japanese jugglers have arrived. There seem to be a fearful demand for Japanese jugglers. The legitimate drama is buried fathoms deep under this spreading taste for barbaric contortions of body and sleight of hand. Aspirants for theatrical fame are advised to quit Shakespeare and devote their time and energy in becoming elastic and contortic.

HOW THE LION STOCKS HIS LARDER WHEN HE IS A PATERFAMILIAS.

WE often read and hear of the wonderful strength of the "King of Beasts," and how it is displayed in carrying on large animals which he has slain, very long distances, to feast at his leisure. My own experience leads me to infer that those who tell such tales are misled by natives, who, as a rule, believe anything that they fancy about the powers of the lion, without taking the trouble to investigate facts; and travelers who have little time, and possibly less inclination to search for themselves, adopt the tales they hear—not willingly deceiving others, but being misled themselves. There is a large class who would, in such cases, prefer the common mode of arguing, i. e. "it is easier to believe than to go and see." I once labored under misconception that the lion had such vast strength that he could convey a cow or a bull, as the case might be, but I was cured of my credulity in the following manner.

Seated at our round-table of African teak, merry as crickets round a hearth, we smoked our cigars in peace and with gusto, for they were a recent present from the ladies of Cape Town, and therefore the sweeter. As we sat piff-puffing, our well-beloved General dropped in, and took a cup of coffee. At the close of one of his charming pictures of home life in England, the General made some observations upon the intelligence of the "colley," or the shepherd's dog, and gave some instances, which exhibited great sagacity on the part of a dog that belonged to a farmer, over whose ground he had shot during one of those too brief intervals in which his military life had permitted him to enjoy the domeatic life he so well loved. While all admitted the cleverness of the dog referred to, Glenlyon, whose Highland birth and early boyhood had furnished him with many indubitable proofs of the sagacity of these useful animals—shepherd's dogs—was appealed to by the General to say whether he had ever known or heard in his native mountains the equal to the one he had spoken of. The Highlander replied he thought he knew instances in which the instinct of the dogs had been as fully developed as in that particular one; "but," said he, "for clear judgment in selecting the most desirable animal from a herd of cattle, and for skill in driving him a long distance after he has been picked out from a herd, and separated from it, I consider a lion or a tiger infinitely superior to any dog that I have ever seen, read or heard of, and some of the tales told in the Highlands and on the Borders are wonderfully stiff ones, I can assure you. Every shepherd's dog, like every man's horse, is 'the best in the world:' that they will maintain; and in order to do so they give some extraordinary instances of superior intelligence. If some of them had heard you say the dog you spoke of went after the beast nineteen miles, found him, brought him back, they would have said they knew a dog that would do all that, and would have sat down and written a letter to his master to say he was coming, in order to relieve the master's mind of his anxiety about the lost beastie as soon as he had found it."

After a langh, in which the General cordially joined, the latter said, for in all matters of hunting, etc., Glenlyon was an authority:

"Is it a fact, Glenlyon, that lions and tigers do actually select beasts from large herds, and drive them to their own retreats?"

"It is, I assure yon; and I really believe a middle-aged lion, one who is a father of a family, is the best drover in the whole world, quadruped or biped. I have seen many men who were accounted to be skillful drovers, and men of vast experience, who never could have done, and never would have attempted, what I have seen a lion and a tiger do with a refactory beast, which he had selected from a herd a hundred times greater in number than any herd we can have in our country—besides their greater wildness—and yet he has taken him off, over the roughest country imaginable, and safely conducted him to his lady-love, who, with her tender babes, was waiting for her supper."

"It seems almost incredible! One can scarcely imagine such capabilities, and yet there must be something of the kind one, now and then; for I remember several cases where cattle have been lost without a trace of blood, or of any struggle whatever having taken place anywhere within a wide radius."

"No doubt," observed Glenlyon, "many a beast has gone down to the account of the Kaffirs which some canine lion has driven off at the end of his nose; but if we were to tell these stupid Dutch boers how they went, they would swear we were descendants of Munchausen or Ferdinand Mendez Pinto."

"And you have seen lions do this?" said the General.

"Repeatedly. I have also seen tigers in India do it, but not so often. As to lions, I will undertake to show instances of their capabilities to any one who will accompany me some night, within a week."

When the General was gone, and we were all seated behind well-lit cigars, I ventured to ask my friend if he would allow me to accompany him on one of his nocturnal expeditions in quest of lions, so that I might have ocular demonstration of the curious fact he had related, a fact so new to me that I received it with surprise. I did not doubt for one moment his accuracy, for I knew him to be exceedingly cool and observant in any position of danger, and eminently truthful in all the relations with which he favored us of his experiences.

"With much pleasure, my dear Snooks. Provide yourself with a good night-glass, so that you may closely watch all his manœuvres, and I have no doubt yon will be highly amused. If the beast he selects should chance to he a young bull, you may see some fun; and the lion will require all his sagacity and agility to make him go the desired road, more especially if there be any trees on the way, or water. The beast will plunge into any stream or lake in the hope to get away from his pursuer; but lions will face water in such a case like a Newfoundland dog, and head him like the best 'colley' that ever put teeth in wool: but if the night be gloomy you will need a good glass to see all the details minutely, as I should wish you to see them."

The next day Glenlyon sent for the Kaffirs, and inquired whether they knew of any lions being within easy distance, especially any lionesses which had had any addition to their family circles lately. Two of them—not the lions, but the Kaffirs—belonging to the last batch of prisoners we had received, grinned, and said in a sort of mysterious whisper, they knew of one—each! oh, such a big one! They were in the large caves beyond the marshes in the devil's cave. There upon the third night after the discussion at the round-table, we bent our steps, accordingly.

We marched on till Glenlyon thought we were near enough to the caves to see any creature leaving them or going in. Of the latter there was not much chance, if it were true that the monarch of beast had taken up his abode therein. While daylight lasted, there was no chance of the royal beast going out—he would be, as Glenlyon said, "about enjoying his last nap prior to getting up and going to business," so there would be plenty of time for us to take some coffee before dusk, after which all signs of fire must he removed.

I lay myself down upon the gorgeous flowers which decked our resting-place. A thicket, an arm of a mighty forest, stretched itself out toward the vast rocks in which "The Caves" were hidden. Every tree was a Titan, and we seemed to be but pigmies creeping through them, and as we did not advance far in, we had all the enjoyment which the brightest foliage and the richest flowers could afford. Pushing some of the lofty parasitical plants on one side with each of his hands, our guide, who was a very useful fellow, by the way, at once made a most luxurious bower for us. It was getting gloomy.

"Keep your eye upon that arched opening in the huge rock. If the lion he there he will come out over those boulders, and his anxious lady will perhaps come out first, to look at the weather; she will be sure to accompany him to the edge of the boulders nearest to us, to see that he goes off to do his night's work."

"Ilitchj, where do you think the old fellow will find beef to-night?" (This to our guide.)

"Daoun ze rippa," (river).

"That's a good ten miles' journey for us, perhaps more, ten as the eagle flies. Picket the coh safely, Ilitchj, cover him up well, get all ready, we may have to start in five minutes."

"I think I see a lion's head." I observed.

"Do you? where? Oh, I see—ah, that is the lady—she is taking a sight of the sky; the screams of the eagles have aroused her, and she is afraid there will he no beef to-night. She is right, too, I will take care of that. Keep your eye upon her till the old gentleman comes. She will fetch him out, if he do not come soon."

I did as requested. I carefully watched the lioness. After looking skyward and downward, and all about her in front of the stronghold in which she dwelt, the lady of the castle suddenly came forward, trotted quickly down between the boulders, and then halted just in front of them, it might be to get a more correct notion of the weather, or to see if any cause of alarm was nigh to account for the row made by the eagles, or both of these purposes. Having apparently satisfied herself, one way or the other, she reascended the path she had gone down with that loose, shambling gait peculiar to the larger beasts of prey, and soon disappeared round the angle of the arched way which led to her den, and where I first caught sight of her head. In a moment she returned, just protruding her head as she had at first. If the lady were not cross, she ought to have been, for she looked so; but I fancy no hungry lioness can look good-tempered, especially if she have some craving youngsters to think about, and a sleepy husband.

I told Glenlyon all this as he was eyeing his double roer to see it was ready for action when required, and he said:

"Ah, the guidwife is gone to rouse the sluggard, she will not be long turning him out. All females have a strange malicious pleasure in rousing a male creature out of his last comfortable nap, whether wife, sister, or a maiden aunt; even a chambermaid at an inn raps twice as hard as the 'Boots' at your door, but any other female in any other office is the same, down to a lioness. Now if that royal sluggard do not tumble out in two minutes or "a brace of shakes," as sailors say, there will be a row—he will get a 'Candle lecture' on the duties of husbands and fathers in providing for their families. Tell me when he comes out, he is sure to he the first under the gateway; you will see him yawning till his head is more than half off, and then stretching himself till his legs seem to be parting from his body, blowing up his wife at intervals for disturbing his natural rest."

It was singular how well my companion knew the habits of the creatures of which he spoke. It did not seem more than a minute ere the very image he had described appeared before my telescope. The head of the lion peered round the angle of the rock, with the huge jaws widely distended, and the cavernous mouth seemed as if it would never close again, so prolonged was the gaping. But it did close, and the head shot suddenly forward, as if somebody pushed him out. Then there was another yawn, and next came a stretch of the fore legs, the body being drawn backward till the legs seemed of an unusual length; next the body was drawn forward, and I could see the wild, shaggy, but not ungraceful mane, and the massive shoulders, while I could well fancy the hind legs were undergoing the elongating process. Then there seemed to be another impulse from behind, and the whole body of the lion was quickly propelled into view, just as he was about to indulge in another yawn, the rude interruption of which seemed to provoke his majesty; for he suddenly sprang round, and his jaws snapped violently at something, which seemed to he too quick for him to catch hold.

"Ilitchj, get on after that reluctant hunter—he moves off but slowly—you will easily keep him in sight. You Kaffirs all know how to follow on the trail of beasts, so I need not tell you to keep on his lee side, as sailors say, but you know I mean that the wind shall blow from him to you."

Ilitchj showed all his teeth and nodded, not á la Burleigh, but with the rapid and forcible motion of a hammer. Glenlyon went on:

"The night is dark. Our signal must he the cry of the young alligator, or, as you call them, 'Goorghj.' Can you make the sound?"

Ilitchj sent forth a shrill plaintive wail, like that of an infant, quite exhausted, but in acute pain; so natural was it that it was startlingly suggestive of dying babies.

"That will do," said Glenlyon, approvingly. "I see yon are a practiced hunter. That signal will keep us together, however dark it may be."

Allowing some minutes to elapse after Ilitchj's departure, we went out of our fairy arbor, and marched on in silence. After turning the angle of the rocks we went on for ten minutes, when Glenlyon sent forth the signal for the whereabouts of our Kaffir guide. It was quite a surprise to me. I had forgotton all about signals, and my thoughts were far away with one very dear to me, and for the life of me I could not help fancying some poor child was in agony. Glenlyon laughed, but he quickly suppressed his mirth, and said, "Listen."

In a moment after the word was uttered, another wail was heard, so full of mortal anguish that I felt as if a cold stream were trickling down my spine.

"We are on the right track," said my companion; "but we must keep more to the right. The lion is leading Ilitchj in that direction, and both he and we must follow our leader for some time to come."

Ever and anon sounded the signal which kept us and our guide well up with each other. Intervals of ten minutes only were allowed to elapse between them; thus we were secure that we were on the right track.

Presently the single cry of the young alligator was heard in a faint tone, but seemingly close to us, and I could hut feel how admirably the signals were arranged. Such a cry could awake no suspicion in the animal we pursued, and it also appeared, even to my unpractised ear, as one just suited to the locality: for away to the right, from whence the wind blew, there seemed to come an odor of malaria, indicating marshy ground, where alligators might he found. I made no remark then, because Glenlyon was exchanging signals with Kaffir to guide him up to us, and in a moment he was before us.

"Do you think we are far from the beef now?" said Glenlyon.

"Close to. Zee tree, two zide? go troo dem"

"Then, in that case, we will all go together. Keep Indian file. I will lead. Snooks, see to your barrels!"

"Send down the ramrod. Ilitchj, do the same. That will do. See to your caps. Never throw a chance away. Out with your night-glass. We will ascend the bank there on the right, where the tallest of the trees are; follow me as stealthily as cats. If there are any monkeys in the trees they will be at use if we make a noise; Ilitchj knows that."

"Ilitchj knows too moosch dat."

"I thought so. Tell this gentleman how to follow me without making any row. On the bank we can sit, if there are no snakes, and watch our friend in his manœuvres to get one out of the herd, and drive him through the gap between the two banks."

We may sit down and rest for an hour; it will take him all that to get the beast he fancies out of the herd and through the gap. Come on."

We followed our leader, whose steps was the lightest I have ever yet seen taken by man, and he was six feet high and over thirteen stone in weight. We soon gained the bank, which was composed of a loose soil, which gave as we placed our feet upon it; and we found the branches and the trunks of the white, or more properly, as I think, the grey, ash very useful in helping us to ascend. At the top. we knelt and looked cautiously over the wide savannah beyond, which was then, the scene of much commotion. The herd had winded the lion. More probably the sentinel on duty, as there always is round herds of wild cattle when feeding and resting, at various points, had seen their dreaded enemy when he stealthily passed through, or before he approached the gap, and if so had given a danger-signal, as usual in such cases.

The lion was going round the herd, which was running wildly and full of consternation, and gradually getting them into a smaller circle. He did his work silently, because the terrors of the poor creatures were sufficient to make them do all he required, which was simply to get them together in as small a compass as possible, knowing that the bulls would all be on the outside of the solid mass, in order to give the females all the protection in their power. This proceeding, as the herd was a vast one, occupied some time, during which he was walking or rather going round them at a sort of shambling pace, neither a walk nor a trot, but something of both; his face upturned to, and his eyes seeming fixed upon those of the animals which faced outwards; but many of them, indeed all the younger bulls, turned their backs upon the enemy, while their heads were anxiously turned back over their shoulders, their eyes glaring in horror and alarm mixed with anguish, that doubtless drove the tears down their cheeks, and caused the white foam to burst forth upon their chests and flanks, and a dense vapor arose from their reeking bodies, like a cloud.

I observed a movement going on within the circle which I could not at all comprehend, and I asked Glenlyon if he knew what it meant?

"Oh yes. Look closely. You will see that all the old bulls are passing up to that part of the ring which faces the gap. There they are concentrating their strength, and their object is to make a 'stamp' there. If you do not know what a 'stamp' means, listen. Whenever wild cattle mean to do mischief their first action is a series of stamps, beginning with the chief of the herd, generally a patriarch of his race, and followed by all who mean to join him in whatever he does, to let him know they are ready and willing. In such a case as this, we may conclude there will be few who will refuse to join in any effort to release themselves from such an enemy as they have near them. The chief sees that the gap is a favorable place for making a bolt; he has been stamping for some minutes to call all the most determined of the bulls about him, and they are working their way up, as well as they can, through such a mass so closely huddled together. So soon as they all get up, the young bulls will be marshalled in a double line, if there be enough of them, to cover the females who are on the inside."

"And will they succeed in getting away?" I asked.

"Impossible to say; that lion knows what he has to do, and how to do it; he may prevent the stamp from being carried out. Lions have a singular power in checking the movements of all animals, and he may succeed in stopping that vast herd, even at the last moment. I need scarcely tell you, that if the stamp actually become a 'stampedo,' as the Saniards call it—that is, if they really commence the run and get off full swing, no power which that lion possesses or a hundred more, could stop them. If he made the effort, he would be gored and trampled to death and to jelly; but his time to check the movement is before it begins, and I expect, from his mode of going to work, he knows that as well as I do. In either case he will not go supperless. If they do succeed in getting away from him, he will have to take one of the rearmost of the herd; if he stop them effectually, he can take his choice of a victim—that is the only difference; but to a lion of taste, and one having a particular wife at home to please her caprices, even that difference may be important, as affecting his domestic peace. She may object to an elderly cow, and if he can get no other, you may imagine the black looks he will get by what you saw of her way of turning him out tonight. Of course, she would prefer a young juicy bull—her own tastes and her motherly instincts will tell her he is better food for her and her young toothless ones than the dry and flavorless flesh of his grandmother."

"I cannot conceive how one animal, even if it be a lion, can succeed in arresting the progress of that vast body of powerful creatures, if they are resolved upon flying from him."

"I suppose not; and there are many others like you, yet it is possible. I have often seen it, and, from what I see of this lion, I expect I shall this night witness the same thing. He is no fool, depend upon it, though he looked foolish when his lady pinched, with her great teeth, that portion of his royal person given him to sit down upon; you or I might look foolish if assailed in the rear, unexpectedly, in that fashion. However, we shall see—and we shall have but a short time to wait—for I see the oldest bulls are nearly all up, and their council will be but a brief one."

"Well, if ever he stops them from bolting—that is, if they are inclined to run—I will eat him. It is against common sense."

"Do not be rash—Jephtha made a vow and repented it—and you might find that lion hard to digest. As to the how he will do it, I will not presume to say anything about it; but mark what I do say—he will do it! I see it is in him, and what is in him will come out, upon a great occasion like this. He will remember the lovely wife at home, and he will ask himself what is the risk of be trampled upon by these creatures, although they are legion, to a certainty of being worried, tooth and nail, by a vixen at home?"

"But it is physically impossible."

"I have heard that before. Indeed, I have heard a good deal of argument, but the proof has always been furnished by the lion. Men say much—nothing that is new or true—lions say nothing, but they do all that is required—my faith rests on the lions."

And sure enough the "physical impossibility," as I supposed it, was being done before my eyes. The herd had got itself massed into as dense a body as could be formed. At first the animals were huddled together without order—heads here and there, and in all directions—but at some signal—some variation in the stamping, probably—every head was turned in the same direction, and that was toward the spot where the oldest bulls were collected; at last, as I have said, was immediately before the gap or opening between the two banks. The opening might be about from fifty to sixty yards. Every head was raised over the back of the beast that stood before it, and, inch by inch, the animals crept up to each other, until they were in a dense column. All waited, as it seemed to us, only for the one remaining signal to be given—that for rushing forward. The centre bulls in front were raising their heads and lowering them alternately, as if preparing for the onward dash; there was but one in that centre which stood still; that is to say, he did not toss his head as the others did, he rather seemed to be intently listening, or as if trying earnestly to ascertain if all in his own rear, and throughout the living mass, were quite ready for the start, before he should give the final signal.

This was the position when the lion slowly appeared in front of the column, for the body was now more in the form of a column than of a circle, as it had originally been. The lion, as I have said, appeared in front—that is to say, at the right-hand angle of the column—about eight, or it might be ten, yards from the front. He stood a moment, as if glaring upon the outside beast, which he directly faced, and then he slowly and side-long moved till he faced the next, where he also made a brief pause; and thus he continued till he had passed along the whole line. This done, the whole column seemed to have no power to move; it stood riged and fixed, as if suddenly petrified into stone by that earnest gaze; each beast of the front row leaning back till the forelegs assumed a sloping position, and the feet were firmly planted in rather than on the earth. It was a singular sight to behold. Each head was held high and drawn back, every eye seemed glaring with horror, and the wreaths of vapor that issued from, and curled above, their distended nostrils, showed how spasmodically they breathed. They were indeed awed into obedience, and motionless from terror.

Still the lion did not think his work complete. Before, he had moved laterally from the right to the left angle of the column, the front of which he "dressed," to use a military phrase, as well as any martinet could desire, as he passed in front of each individual beast, to whom he presented his own full front. Now he proceeded to repeat the lateral movement from left to right, in just the same manner as before, pausing before each animal as he had done previously, standing a brief space before each, till he had reached the last bull in the front rank. Arrived there, he gave the loudest roar which I had ever heard from any beast—but my experience was then limited—and that roar was repeated, when the vapor that arose from the dense mass of cattle ascended slowly, but in a quantity which showed how they all perspired in their agony of terror.

"What think you of a lion's power now, Common-Sense?" said Glenlyon, in a whisper.

I was silent, indeed my astonishment kept me speechless, and at the same time, I confess that shame at my rash observations might have had something to do with it. I could not remove my telescope from the beast, and I saw him go down the side of the column, still moving laterally, and presenting his full front to every creature he passed. I fancied he was going round the entire body, and was thinking it would occupy some time if he did so, when my companion again whispered:

"See, he has made his choice: now watch him."

I did so. Just as Glenlyon began to whisper, the lion had stood somewhat longer than he had before the last beast he passed, and he drew back about a yard, giving the earth at the same moment a mighty strike with his fore-paw. Having waited about half a minute, as near as I could guess, he repeated the stroke with more violence than before, and uttered a fearful roar, and drew himself farther back. The animal to which he thus addressed himself seemed involuntarily to dart forward a step, and then as if in great terror to retreat again into the rank he had quitted. But this was not what the lion meant to be. He gave a heavier stroke than any with his foot, and then laid himself down in the attitude which lions always assume when they intend to make a spring; then the tyrant seemed to wait the effect of this manifest threat.

Too well the trembling victim seemed to comprehend the power before him. Slowly, and with timid hesitation, he moved one foot forward—it was but a short step he made, but the other foot seemed to totter after it—not placing it before the first, but on a level with it. The lion must have been intently glaring with his own eyes into those of the victim, but that of couse we could not see, we could only feel it must be so. Another feeble step was taken, followed as before by the other foot being placed on a level with it, and then it was that the art of the tyrant was cunningly manifested. Seeing that these two steps had, short though they were, nearly brought half the body of the young bull out of the rank, he raised himself gently from the ground, and took two steps backward, so that the trembling victim might come entirely out without being further terrified by coming so very near to him. The movement, as no doubt it was intended to do, seemed to give a slight encouragement to the bull, for he slowly stepped in the same manner as before, quite out of the rank, and, the instant he did so, the lion quickly stepped, catlike, on one side, farther from the gap through which he desired the animal to go in his rear, then a bark, rather than a roar, so suddenly that the sharp noise, together with another powerful stroke with his paw on the ground, made the bull dart forward quickly toward the head of the column, the lion following him up closely behind, to prevent him from turning and going along the front rank. As he reached the angle formed by the side and front of the mass, he uttered another more furious roar, struck the earth with his paws with great force and rapidity three times, and the unfortunate bull bounded through the gap just beneath us!

On went the lion after him.

"He will have to travel at a slower rate than that which brought him here," said Glenlyon, "we need not follow him directly. The bull will give him some trouble yet, but, if he is ever so tractable, he will not go fast, and we can soon get up with them. Better stay a few minutes to see how that mass of blockheads recover their scattered senses. Here is a proof, if any were needed, that fear on one side makes an easy conquest for the other side."

Fully ten minutes elapsed ere the chief bull of the herd began to shift his position, the rest not venturing to stir till he did. He was the leader—their duty was to obey. Some of the young bulls grew impatient, but a poke from the horn of some sedate cow brought them to their senses, and they were still again. At length the leader moved one step forward. He listened; nothing seemed to alarm him; he stamped his feet, other bulls did the same, and then all the heads were pointed toward him as he wheeled round the angle of the column, and thence dashed on in a mad gallop over the broad savannah, in the opposite course to that taken by the lion, and were soon lost to our view. They had escaped. Little they recked of the poor victim they had so meekly surrendered, or of the tortures he was enduring in that midnight journey to death. In this world few think of the sufferings of others, if they escape suffering themselves.

"Ilitchj," called Glenlyon. Ilitchj was fast asleep. The lion might eat all the beef in the herd, for ought he cared; but one magical word aroused him, and brought him grinning to us. "Schnapps" was the potent signal to recall his slumbering faculties—the "open sesame" to his understanding—such as it was. It was rather a singular fact, that when the Kaffirs were once assured we did not dine off them, we could never find one that wished to get away from us. If we asked them why they did not go, the reply was, "Like moosch besser ztop—goot to ztop—run away no goot—no moosch blenty eat—no zshnapp—tam bat, dat, eh? It became proverbial among our men that when a Kaffir got into the camp or barracks he never knew when to go, and the men would add, "they are such funny little beggars, one can't kick 'em out, it's a pity to hurt 'em."

In half an hour after Glenlyon and I left the bank on which we had rested, we got up to Ilitchj. He was about two hundred yards in the rear of the lion, who had his "hands full." The young bull was a lusty fellow, and a handsome specimen of his race. He had no fancy for being driven, and did not pin his faith on lions. Every now and then he would try to make a bolt with much persistency, but the power of the lion was most wonderful in stopping him. When the bull would make a sweep in the form of an arc, in order to avoid his persecutor, and to get back to those he loved, the lion did not put himself greatly out of the way. His eyes were always upon his prey, and thus he detected the slightest attempt at

LITERARY GOSSIP AND GLEANINGS.

MR. SWINBURNE'S "SONG OF ITALY."

THE London Athenæum thinks that the key to this remarkable poem, may he found in the supposition that the singer is probably meant to be understood, not as the English poet in person, but as an Italian patriot, a Roman by birth, and a republican in creed. The Athenœum says:

"A cry of Mazzini, Mazzini, Viva Mazzini l is the burthen of his song, the reason of its being, and the sole element of its life. In such a singer as we have supposed, this strain would be dramatically true. A Roman patriot, a professor of extreme opinions, would be sure to regard the Italian exile as the hightest expression of his country's genius. Praise which, coming from English lips, would be rebuked as fantastical and extravagant, would he received from him as the genuine langnage of political admiration, even though it might be regarded as undeserved. The praise would be dramatically true.

The conception of some such singer of the 'Song of Italy' is, in fact, the reader's chief difficulty; for many things in the poem, otherwise black as night, become plain enough the moment it is made clear that it is not Mr Swinhurue who chants and rhapsodizes, hut a fiery Italian partisau of Signor Mazzini's ideas. For instance, England is abused, and France denounced on grounds which an Englishman would hardly understand, still less admit to be just. Again, the pressure of the poem is against the Pope, in favor of Mazziui; and the praises lavished on the Roman triumvir are pitched in a high key enough to draw shrieks of horror from our trading respectahilities. If our theory is good as to this dramatic design of the 'Song of Italy,' Mr. Swinburne will have a perfect right to deny his responsibility for mnch of the sentiment uttered by the imaginary Italian poet."

The poem opens in a powerful, though rather rhapsodical lyric strain, with a vision of freedom revealed to the poet in the watches of the night. There is a certain pomp and splendor in the language which cannot fail to produce an effect even upon minds to which it conveys no very distinct image of the majestic vision:

Upon a windy nigbt of stars tbat fell
At the wind's spoken speli,
Swept the sharp strokes of agonizing ligbt
From the clear gulf of night,
Between the fixed and fallen glories one
Against my vision shone,
More fair aad fearful and diviue than they
That measure night and day,
And worthier worship; and within mine eyes
The formless folded skies
Took shape and were unfolded like as flowers;
And I heheld the hours
As maidens, and the days as laboring men,
Aud the soft nights again
As weired women to their own sonls wed,
And ages as the dead,
And over these living, and them tbat died,
From one to the other side
A lordlier light than comes of earth and air
Made the world's future fair.
A woman like to love in face, but not
A thing of transient lot—
And like to hope, but having bold on truth—
And like to joy or youth,
Save that upon the rock her feet were set—
And like what men forget,
Faith, innocenee, high thought, laborious peace—
And yet like none of these,
Being not as these are, mortal, bnt with eyes
That sonnded the deep skies
And clove like wings or arrows their clear way
Througb night and dawn and day—
So fair a presence over star and sun
Stood, making these as one.

An apostrophe to Mazzini, opens thus:

But thou, though all were not well done, O chief,
Must thou take shame or grief?
Because one man is not as thou or ten,
Mnst thou take shame for men?
Because the supreme sunrise is not yet,
Is the young dew not wet?
Wilt thou not yet abide a little while,
Soul without fear or guile,
Mazzini—O our prophet, O our priest,
A little while at least?
A little hour ot doubt and of control,
Sustain thy sacred soul;
Withhold thine heart, our fatber, hut an hour,
Is it not here, the flower,
Is it not blown and fragrant from tbe root,
And shall not be the fruit?
Thy children, even thy people thou hast made,
Thine, with thy words arrayed,
Clothed with thy thoughts and girt with thy desires,
Yearn up toward thee as fires.
Art thou not father, O father, of all these?
From thine own Genoese
To where of nights the lower extreme lagune
Feels its Venetian moon:
Nor suckling's mouth nor mother's breast set free,
But hath that grace through thee.
The milk of life on death's unnatural brink
Thou gavest them to driak,
The natural milk of freedom; and again
They drank, and they were men.
The wine and honey of freedom and of faith
They drank, and cast off death.
Bear with them now; thou art holier; yet endure,
Till they as thou be pure.

We pass to Garibaldi for a moment:

Thon too, O splendor of the sudden sword
That drove the crews abhorred
From Naples and the siren-footed strand,
Flash from thy master's hand,
Shine from the middle summer of the seas
To the old Æolides,
Oushine their fiery flames of burning night,
Sword with thy midday light,
Flame as a beacon from the Tyrrbene foam
To the rent heart of Rome,
From the island of her lover and thy lord,
Her savfour and her sword
In the fierce year of failure and of fame,
Art thou not yet the same
That wert as lightning swifter than all wings
In the blind face of kings?
Wheu priests took counsel to deviee despair,
And princes to forswear,
She clasped thee, O ber sword and flag-hearer
And staff and shield to her,
O Garibaldi: need was bers and grief,
Of thee and of the chief,
And of another girt in arms to stand
As good of hope and hand,
As high of soul and happy, albeit indeed
The heart should burn and bleed,
So but the spirit shake not, nor the breast
Swerve, hut abide its rest.

The following passionate apostrophe to Rome is exceedingly powerful:

O priestless Rome that sbalt be, take in trust
Their names, their deeds, their dust,
Who held life less than thon wert; be the least
To thee indeed a priest,
Priest and hurnt-offering and blood-sacrifice
Giveu without prayer or price.
A holier immolation than meu wist,
A costlier encharist,
A sacrament more saving; hend thine head
Above these many dead
Once, and salute with thine eternal eyes
Their lowest head that lies.
Speak from thy lips of immemorial speech
If hut one word for each.
Kiss but one kiss on each thy dead sons' month
Fallen dumb or north or south.
And laying but once thiue hand on brow and breast,
Bless them, through whom thou art hlest.
And saying in ears of these thy dead, "Well done,"
Shall they not hear, "O son?"
And bowing thy face to theirs made pale for thee,
Shall the shut eyes not see?
Yea, through the hollow-hearted world of death,
As light, as hlood, as breath,
Shall there not flasb and glow the fiery sense,
The pulse of prescience?
Shall not these know as in times overpast
Thee loftiest to the last?
For times and wars shall change, kingdoms and creeds
And dreams of men, and deeds:
Earth shall grow gray with all her golden things,
Pale peoples and hoar kiugs;
But though her thrones and towers of nations fall,
Death has no part in all;
In the air, nor in the imperishable sea,
Nor heaven, uor truth, nor thee.
Yea, let all sceptre-stricken nations lie,
But live thon though they die;
Let their flags fade as flowers that storms can mar,
But thine be like a star;
Let England's, if it float not for men free,
Fall, and forget the sea;
Let France's, if it shadow a hateful head,
Drop as a leaf drops dead;
Thine let what storm soever smite the rest
Smite as it seems him best;
Thine let the wind that can, by sea or land,
Wrest from thy banner-hand.
Die they in whom dies freedom, die and cease,
Though the world weep for these;
Live thou and love and lift when these be dead
The green and white and red.

Portions of the following fervid and lofty glorification of Italy and Rome are remarkable for strength and splendor of expression, while in other portions we are ahle to perceive nothing but the swing and majesty of the rhythm and the pomp and magnificence of the langnage that swells and subsides like a strain of martial music:

Italia! by the passion of the pain
That bent and rent thy chain;
Italia! hy the breaking of the bands,
The shaking of the lands;
Beloved, O men's mother, O men's qneen,
Arise, appear, be seen!
Arise, array thyself in manifold
Queen's raiment of wrought gold:
With girdles of green freedom, and with red
Roses, and white snow shed
Above the flush and frontage of the hills
That all thy deep dawn fills
And all thy clear night veils and warms with wings
Spread till the morning sings;
The rose of resurrection, and the bright
Breast lavish of the light,
The lady lily like the snowy sky
Ere the stars wholly die;
As red as blood,, and whiter than a wave,
Flowers grown as from thy grave,
From the green fruitful grass in Maytime hot,
Thy grave, where thou art not.
Gather the grass and weave, in sacred sign
Of the ancient earth divine,
The holy heart of things, the seed of birth,
The mystical warm earth,
O thou her flower of flowers, with treble braid
Be thy sweet head arrayed,
In witness of her mighty motherhood
Who bore thee and found thee good,
Her fairest-born of children, on whose head
Her green and white and red
Are hope and light and life, inviolate
Of any latter fate.
O our Republic that shall blind in bands
The kingdomless far lands
And link the chainless ages; thon that wast
With England ere she past
Among the faded nations, and shalt he
Again, when sea to sea
Calls through the wind and light of morning time,
And throneless clime to clime
Makes antiphonal answer; thou that art
With one man's perfect heart
Burns, one man's brow is brightened for thy sake,
Thine, strong to make or break;
O fair Republic hallowing with stretched hands
The limitless free lands.
When all men's heads for love, not fear, bow down
To thy sole royal crown,
As though to freedom, when men's life smells sweet,
And at thy bright swift feet
A bloodless and a bondless world is laid:
Then, when thy men are made,
Let these indeed as we in dreams behold
One chosen of all thy fold,
One of all fair things fairest, one exalt
Above all fear or fault,
One unforgetful or unhappier men
And us who loved her then;
With eyes that outlook suns and dream on graves;
With voice like quiring waves;
With heart the holier for their memories' sake
Who slept that she might wake;
With breast the sweeter for that sweet blood lost,
And all the milkless cost;
Lady of earth, whose large equality
Finds but to her and thee;
Equal with heaven, and infinite years,
And splendid from quenched tears;
Strong with old strength of great things fallen and fled,
Diviner for her dead;
Chaste of all stains and perfect from all scars,
Above all storms and stars,
All winds that blow through time, all waves that foam,
Our Capitolian Rome.

The Athenœum concludes its review of the poem as follows:

"Thongh the form of this 'Song of Italy' is dramatic, and the singer an Italian, we have no doubt that, on the whole, Swinhurne has, in the foregoing verses, mainly expressed his own ideas. The desire to do justice to Mazzini is becoming a note of high and poetic natures. Whatever our trading respectabilities may think on the subject, our yonng men of ideas leel that he, chiefly, has made Italy into a nation. Remembering that our own Milton was proscribed, that onr own Sidney was exiled, they affect—and wisely affect—to care little for the accidents of contemporary politics. They fiud in him a great thinker and teacher, and perhaps there is not much harm done when their proud resentment against his wrongs carries the sympathetic admiration of his genius and his service into some excess. Yonth justifies a noble generosity."

DR. THRALL'S ESSAY ON THE EPISCOPATE, AS THE MISSIONARY ORDER OF THE CHURCH.

Dr. S. C. Thrall, formerly rector of Trinity Church in this clty, and one of the most learned theologians in the United States, has recently published an essay entitled "The Episcopate the Missionary Order of the Church," which cannot fail to attract a considerable share of attention in the Episcopal Communion.

Doctor Thrall declares that the Church has failed "in her work of gathering in the nations," and thinks that the source of the failure is to be fonnd "in the maladjustment of the offices of the Church, and the relation of her officers," and in "the disturbance of the true relation of the Episcopate by the usurpations of the Papacy." In his preface, the writer says:

"To state concisely the great misfortnne of the whole Reformed Church, it is that she has inherited from the Papacy a practically mutilated Episcopate, a Papal Episcopate without a Pope. The powers of the Episcopate which the Bishop of Rome gradnally stole away from other bishops, have been left with him, and uever resumed. When we consider that the specific work of the Church of God is to disciple the nations, and that the Reformed Church in ten generations has lost to heresy, schism and the world at least three-fonrths of the descendants of her own children, and more than ten times, probably more than one hundred times, as many as she has gained from the world, it must be conceded that the Reformed Church is in this part of her work one of the most illustrious failures of Christendom. The author has meditated a review of the causes of this failnre, a full statement of the facts, the tracing them to their proper source, which he believes to be primarily the maladjustment of the relations of the offices of the Church. This would involve a consideration of the history of the Reformed Church, and a tracing of the steps by which the Episcopates of primltive times came to be by the encroachments of the Bishop of Rome and the interference of the secular power snch a piece of pure, ecclesiastical mechanism for merely perfunctory uses as it is at this day. Such a work he believes to be greatly needed ar this time. He has alluded to it here only that he might not be thought to have been ignorant of how large a subject that was on the borders of which only he had come. His excuse is that when he wrote, now ten months since, he wrote with a view to one branch of the subject, and for a particular purpose."

The main argument of the essay, is designed to show that the Episcopate, as distinct from the other orders, is "the missionary order of the Church;" that Bishops are the proper ones personally to do this work, and that the pastoral work belongs properly in the economy of the Church, to the second order. We shall give some extracts from the essay itself, next week.

GOOD DIGESTION.—Men who succeed need not have any subtile minds, or brilliant imaginations, or marvelous powers of indnstry. Some indnstry, some imagination, and some acuteness are, doubtless, indispensahle. Bnt the one indispensable factor is a good digestion. The laborions man and the indnstrions man is often of an atrabilious temperament, gloomy and austere; or he is nervous, fidgetty, anxious and fretful. In neither case is he successful. He may consnme gallons of midnight oil on some very clever or very learned book, but after being a three weeks' lion, he will find himself supplanted in the homage of society by his own book, or by some sharp, quick-witted, off-hand spark, who picks his brains, repeats his sayings, appropriates his facts or his inferences, and gains all the credit that is really dne to the genius and industry of a discontented dyspeptic. Who is the successful man? The man with a good stomach, ample barrel, broad face, glowing cheeks, and a ruddy smile, which may denote good-humor, sympathy, or perfect indifference. Who does not know the "capital good fellow" of society, with his rosy gills, habitnal smile, and white teeth; his little innuendoes, and his significant looks, indicating that he knows your latest secret and last-formed plans?

LOVE can excuse anything except meanness; hnt meanness kills love, cripples even natural affection; without esteem, true love cannot exist.

MEN, in general, are more completely persnaded by the suggestions of their own minds, than by reasons offered them hy others.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

ON Monday, Miss Helen Western and a large proportion of the stock company of Maguire's Opera House went to Sacramento. In the evening, Mrs. C. R. Saunders, the favorite low-comedy actress, made her first appearance since her return from the East, playing "Nancy Strap" in the farce of The Pleasant Neighbor. The Martinetti Troupe change their base on Monday and appeared, after the farce, in gymnastic exercises and feasts of strength. The performance concluded with the pantomime of The Red Gnome, which was well put upon the stage and well played. This bill with but little alteration was presented until last night, when the fine spectacular extravaganza entitled The Elves was produced. The favorite actress, Miss Sallie Hinckley, made her reappearance on the stage of the Opera House on this occasion, as "Sylvia," and pretty Miss Alicia Mandeville Thorne made her first appearance since her return from the East as "Eoline," Mrs. Sophie Edwin played "Prince Lubin" and Mrs. C. R. Saunders appeared in the comic part of "Phillis." The Martinetti Troupe with their fine ballet company appeared in beautiful ballets and in their great gymnastic and athletic exercises in the "fete" scene. The play concluded with a magnificent illuminated tableau. This afternoon and evening this attractive performance will be repeated and will probably run for many nights.

Leslie and Raynor, the talented minstrels, (late of Christy's Minstrels,) have made a hit at the Metropolitan Theater. Large and fashionable audiences have heen in attendance every night this week. The performance is a good one throughout, though the choruses in the "First Part" would be better if the company were strengthened hy the addition of two or three more voices. However, good voices are not easily obtained in these operatic times. Harry Leslie s singing and acting are admirable, and he has a good stock of amusing jokes. His song "In the Rain," proved very popular. Harry Raynor's greatest hit is his performance ou the Japanese fiddle, a diabolical one-stringed instrument, from which he draws the most excruciating sonnds, expressing the agony they cause him by wonderfully funny facial coutortions. Leslie and Raynor are very good in their negro acts, those entitled "Tragedy Rehearsed" and "The Rhinoserous," never fail to convulse the audience with laughter. A grand matinee will be given this afternoon, and a capital bill has been prepared for this evening. Next week the burlesque opera of Maritana, which has been in rehearsal for a week past, will be produced. To ensure the representation of this capital burlesque—one of the best performed by Christy's Minstrels—in unexceptionably good style, Henri Herberte, the fine English Tenor, who has delighted the public on many occasions of late, and Miss Julia Gould, the clever singer and burlesque actress, have been engaged. These operatic burlesques are sure to prove popular. Messrs. Leslie and Raynor's repertory comprises hurlesques on all the best operas of the day, including L'Africaine.

On Monday, the Japanese Mikado Troupe of seventeen male and female artistes will make their appearance at the Academy of Music. The performances of these artistes will consist of slack rope walking, tub balancing, conjuring, etc. Yoshigeeroo, the Yedo Hercules, assisted by his family will perform wonderful balancing feats, Toroonoski, the Japanese Blondin, will construct a ladder of paper in the presence of the audience, and, ascending it, perform on it—Japanese paper must be pretty good—hetter than that of some of our merchants. He will accomplish other strange feats. Tzenageero will walk barefooted up a ladder of swords placed edge uppermost. The above enumerated feats will give some idea of the quality of this troupe.

Edwin Adams is at present on his way to San Francisco, and will appear at Maguire's Opera House. The Great Dragon Troupe of Japanese jongleurs, balancers, slack rope ascensionists and musical and dancing girls from the Great Dragon Theater, Osaca, are expected to arrive daily, and will probably appear at the Metropolitan Theater. The public will probably again have an opportunity afforded them of judging of the respective merits of two troupes at the same time.

Mrs. Laura Cuppy will deliver a lecture as usual to-morrow evening at Mechanics' Institute Hall, and will, at the request of the Eight Hour League, deliver an address at the same place on Monday evening, on the conclusion of the other exercises of the day. TOUCHSTONE.

WOODWARD'S GARDENS.—The childrcu all have a holiday at present and picnics are in vogue. No more delightful spot for a picnic than Woodward's Gardens can be found. The children delight in looking at the bears and the animals and riding on the camel.

PACIFIC MUSEUM.—The numerous wonders to be seen here please and surprise all who see them. The many thousands of dollars expended on this collection have produced an immense exhibition.

THE cultivation of some souls is merely local, as if you should rub a dry log in one spot to produce fire, all the rest remaining cold.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S BOOK.—Queen Victoria, says a London correspondent, has written a work entitled "Leaves from a Journal in the Highlands," which consists of about forty papers, descriptive of her life at Balmoral and the neighborhood. The work is illustrated by photographs and wood cuts from her majesty's sketches. It contains, among other interesting matter, three long accounts of her incognito journeys made hy the prince consort and herself to different parts of Scotland, aud the adventures which they met with. In one of the papers she gives an account of the preaching of Dr. Norman McLeod, of Glasgow, and after stating how astonished she was that any one could preach "so eloquently and touchingly without notes," she adds, "and then he prayed so kindly for me and the prince in the after prayer that I was deeply touched; hut when he invoked God's blessing on the children, I felt a great lump come in my throat." She had not expected to be prayed for so kindly hy a Presbyterian, and least of all did she expect him to remember the children. I think there is something touching in this simple note of the queen-wife and mother, which shows how true a woman she is. Only forty copies of the work have been printed for special friends and favorites, but sooner or later it will of course be reprinted, and will he a most interesting addition to contemporary literature. What would the world not give for such a work by Queen Mary or Queen Elizabeth? The copy from which I have quoted bore on the title-page the following inscription:

"To dear Jeannie G——, in remembrance of many, many happy hours—gone never to return again. from V. R."

NEW MUSIC.—We have received from M. Gray, the music publisher, 613 Clay street, the following pieces of new music, received by the last steamer: "Early in the morning, Merrily Oh; or, Pretty Little Sarah," as sung by Kelly and Leon's Minstrels. "Queen of the night," a serenade, as sung by Mrs. George Simpson; words by Geo. Cooper, music by J. R. Thomas. "If I Had But Two Little Wings," words, by Coleridge, from the German, music by H. Perabeau. The favorite Irish Melody, "Pat Malloy," with hrilliant variations for the piano, by Theo. Mœllins, and the beautiful song "I am Lonely To-night," arranged with variations, by the same author. This musical feast will draw all the musical young ladies of San Francisco—and all our prettiest young ladies are musical—to Gray's store on Clay street.

A CHANCE FOR ECONOMICAL LADIES.—The ladies of San Francisco are often accused of being extravagant iu dress, and no doubt many are. There are, however, thousands who want an opportunity to purchase a dress at a low rate instead of buying the latest imported goods without reference to cost. A capital opportunity is offered the economically-inclined at the preseut time. The great dry goods house of Meagher, Taaffe & Co., are offering at their retail store, 9 Montgomery street, certain descriptions of goods at from 20 to 40 per cent. less than cost of importatiou. These goods are of superior quality and of the most useful description. A black silk dress is, as every lady knows, always fashonable. Meagher, Taaffe & Co. are selling pieces of good black dress silk at $1 aud $1 25, and other of the finer qualities from $2 50 to $8. Housekeepers should carefully read and ponder on the advertisement which appears in another columu. Large houses like that of Meagher, Taaffe & Co., frequently become overstocked with goods and are compelled to turn them into cash at a sacrifice.

FOR HEALTH, go to the Hot Springs, bathe in and drink the waters, whose odor remindeth of aged eggs; wallow in mud springs natil your slimy person shall resemble the crawling reptiles of a Louisiana bayou; battle with the flies and mosquitoes, and be suffocated with the pulverized clay of the country: fail to realize your wishes, and be digusted with the result of your enterprise, and then call upon Dr. Bourne, 10 Masonic Temple, who, from his loag experience, skill and practical knowledge, guarantees cures in almost all cases, and tbus recover the treasure of lost health. *

KELLER'S WINES.—Keller's wines have stood tbe test for years of public opinion, and the committees of all the Fairs have awarded the premiun on them over other competitors. The Front street merchants have their orders filled in cases from Keller's wiae cellar, corner of Washington and Battery streets; while families are supplied (by the case) with the best quality of Old White Wine, Sherry, Maderia, and Port. Drinkers of Maderia Wine sbould sample Keller's Maderia, whicb, in flavor, is like the Old Teneriffi.

PORK TRIMMINGS.—Where is the housekeeper that will not get all the pork they can for a sbilling, and Wilson & Stevens at the corner of Market Sutter and Sansome streets gives more pork for a shilling than any other establishmeut. This is the place for both the rich and the poor to bny their meats. It comes fresh every day from their extensive slaughter house at Black Point.

HORSES and dogs are quadrupeds, and there the similarity ends. Just so with Baths. The Russian, Turkish, Persian, Greek, Irish or Digger Indian Baths, are no more like DR. BOURNE'S Baths than are horses and dogs. DR. BOURNE'S Baths are universally acknowledged hy all competent judges to be superior to all otbers in their admirable effect upon tbe system, in health or disease *

WE do not belive in "cure-alls" until we tried AYER'S inimitable PILLS, aud now we think the whole secret lies in the fact, that purgatives are the natural remedy for disease, and Dr. Ayer has made the best of purgatives. They cure all our compluints—Logan (O) Press.

"DR. BOURNE'S BATHS."—The naiform testimony is, that as a luxury, or for the cure of ailments, they are unequalled—No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. *

ELECTRICITY.—Four bits for the use of the powerful electric-magnetic battery of Dr. Bourne, 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. Useful in neuralgia, etc. *

UNPROTECTED FEMALES.—At six in the evening we moved off from Beyrout, with an additiou of some hundred pilgrims; and as night came on, beds were spread in such numbers on the deck that we had but a narrow strip to walk up and down in. The devout Mussulmans had scarce room to say their prayers, but say them they did, diving their turbans, as they prostrated themselves, into the faces and laps of sleeping groups. One of these groups, which occupied a nook near the steersman, had very white, clean cushions. Three women, in the ample calico envelopes within which these Eastern females enclose themselves, were lying down, apparently asleep, in the moonlight. When our tea, however, was brought, one of them suddenly started up, and coming toward us, seized a spoon that lay in the sugar-bowl, and, taking a portion, tasted it, thinking it salt; then sitting down beside us, she began a wild song, finishing with a strange trill, that might have vibrated a mile over the silent sea. She talked a great deal, and gave us each something, orange, nuts, etc. After awhile she went away again to her couch, but ever and anon started up from it, breaking out into song, and terminating with the trill, in alto. She came to us again, frequently hovering round us, and addressing each. Meanwhile, a few more of these half-wild creatures were amusing themselves by looking down into the cabin, their black eyes under the veils making the sippers of tea below start when they met their glance. A fast French lady, who came on board at Beyrout, was another specimen of female loneliness, for our singular Asiatic had come from the far interior, and was going to Mecca quite by herself. Madame Olympe was a pretty person, quite young, and affecting to be a literary character. She had passed, she said, three mouths with the ladies of the harem, and gave us what she assured us was a very truthful representation of their life.—Pilgrimage to Eastern Shrines.

THE NEXT DELUGE.—A French work recently published maintains that every ten thousand five hundred years the waters of the sea pass from one pole to the other, submerging and overwhelming, in their passage, the earth and all its inhabitants. According to the author of this theory, M. Paul de Jouvencel, the last of these deluges occurred four thousand years ago; the next one is due in six thousand years more. M. Jouvencel recounts this great cosmical drama with the vigor and pictorial effect of an eye-witness. Six thousand years—sixty centuries—then only are left to us wherein to do our whole world's work, and to complete and perfect the civilization which has yet hardly dawned upon the greater number of mankind! Sixty old men may touch hands across the interval between the present moment and the last hour of the world as it exists; then all will be finished. all consumed; all will disappear! the sea for ten thousand five hundred years, in its immeasurable depths, will crush out our history, and leave nothing of it all hut a few fossils! So, at least, says M. Jouvencel.

WHY YOUNG LADIES STARE.—An exchange says the reason that young ladies seem to have a habit of staring, is simply because they cannot help it, as to keep in the fashion they are compelled to wear such a hunch of stuff at the back of the head that the natural hair is drawn to the highest tension, and as the skin of the forehead is drawn back, the eyelids also get an upward tendency that leaves the impression that the girls look bold and fierce. It's all a mistake. The dear creatures are just as gentle and lovable as they ever were, and they would be very willing to lower their eyelids if they could do so, without lifting the tremendous hall that is bound to the head in such a disadvantageous position. When the waterfalls get ignored by fashion, the girls will look as meek-eyed as they did before the advent of that monstrosity of fashion.

THE SCHOOL EXERCISES which have been given during the present week, have shown unusual ability and industry on the part of those in charge of the various school departments, and a great proficiency and advancement on the part of the thousands of pupils under their charge. There is probably no city in the Union that can boast of a more efficient and commendable school department than that of San Francisco.

NO CHOLERA ON THE NICARAGUA TRANSIT.—A large number of passengers by the America, which arrived yesterday, testify in a published card to the fact that there is no cholera or epidemic of any kind on the Nigaragua Transit. The telegraphic report from the East that the cholera was raging extensively in Nigarauga received here some two weeks since, was evidently a manufactured one.

AMONG the popular errors not to be found enumerated in any "Commonplace Book" are these: That editors keep public reading-rooms. That they have plenty of time to talk to everybody. That they are delighted to get anything to fill up the paper with. That every man's own special ax is a matter of "public interest." That it doesn't make much difference whether copy he written on both sides.

IT is as easy to write a gaudy style without ideas, as it is to spread a pallet of showy colors, or to smear in a flaunting transparency.

FOOLS are the worst of all thieves; they rob us of time and temper.

THE PLAINTIFF NONSUITED.

A LAWYER'S STORY.

"GENTLEMEN, it is unnecessary, perhaps, for me to tell any of my legal brothers here, that the summer in Nassau Street is hot; but I may be allowed to say, in passing, that it was very hot in my office in Nassau Street on one particular August afternoon, a dozen years since. In fact, I was sitting very unprofessionally in my shirt-sleeves, when Mr. Lockshaw—firm of Phillips and Lockshaw—came into the office, rather red, and much excited."

"'Mr. Riley,' said he, 'you must go to Wisconsin to-night. We have fifteen thousand dollars due us there from Wells & Co., and we learn from private advices that they are going to sell out, and run away to California. Now what can we do, except attach their property?'

"'Nothing,' I replied, 'and you will be very fortunate if you do that before they assign.'

"His finger trembled at this suggestion, as he moved it slowly over the map; and, stopping suddenly, he said: 'Here it is, on the Fox River, about a day's drive back from Lake Michigan. There is no town marked on the map, but you can't miss it. We will give you a thousand dollars extra, beside your expenses and regular fee.'

"'Well, Mr. Lockshaw, I suppose there is no use in refusing, so get your notes ready, and I'll leave on the next train.'

"He had not been gone ten minutes when up came Mr. Wolfe, an old friend and client; and, what was much more important to me, the father of Fanny Wolfe, who, according to a mutual agreement, was to become Mrs. Riley two months from that date.

"'Well, Riley, I'm glad to find you in,' said he, with something of the patronizing air of a prospective father-in-law, 'you must go to Wisconsin for me.'

"'Wisconsin! What is the matter there, sir?'

"'A good deal,' said he; 'fifteen thousand dollars at least, and hanging by a single thread, too.'

"'Fifteen thousand dollars! What shape is it in?' said I. 'Who owes it to you?'

"'Wells & Co.,' he replied. 'Why, what's the matter, Riley? Are they friends of yours?'

"You will excuse me, gentlemen, for having been so unprofessional, on this occasion, as to allow my face to betray my feelings," said Riley to us, "but I recovered immediately, and replied to Wolfe that they were not my friends, and asked him where Wells & Co. lived.

"'About a day's drive back from Lake Michigan, on the Fox River,' said he, 'and you must attach their goods. They have a large stock I'm told—some forty thousand dollars' worth.'

"'I am very sorry, Mr. Wolfe, that it so happens,' said I, greatly perplexed at the unpleasant position I was in, 'but I cannot go for you.'

"'You must,' said he, positively; 'I depend on it. You are not going somewhere else, are you?'

"'No, not exactly,' said I, anxiously, for he was not a man to be trifled with, and I felt uneasy when I thought of Fanny. 'But I'm going to be busy—very busy—in fact entirely absorbed in a case for another client.'

"'Who is it?' said he. 'You must put him off. This is too important, and must be attended to. I will give you twenty-five hundred dollars and your expenses, if you'll go.'

"'But I cannot attend to it. I assure you, unless my other clients release me. I will send them a note, and they can decide while I am getting ready to go.'

"So I wrote a note to Phillips and Lockshaw, stating the case, and urging them to unite with Mr. Wolfe, and let me collect on account of both claims, as Mr. Wolfe said he understood there was forty thousand dollars' worth of goods in Wells & Co.'s store.

"When I had finished writing, the errand-boy had not returned. Here was a dilemma, for I had no time to see my clients in person, and Mr. Wolfe was pacing the room much excited. He had long been my client, and I had made a thousand dollars from his business where I had a hundred dollars from Phillips and Lockshaw; besides, I was to be one of his family in two months; but I had been retained by the other parties, and professional honor, of course, demanded my utmost exertions in their behalf, against all opponents whatsoever.

"'Well,' said he turning sharp on his heel, seeing me holding the note by one corner, 'how is it?'

"'Why, my boy is gone, and I cannot get this delivered, nor have I time to see them, for I must go off on the next train, and need all my time to get ready in. You must employ some other lawyer this time.'

"'Here,' said he, 'I'll deliver the note.'

"'No, sir,' said I, fearful of an interview between him and Lockshaw; 'I wouldn't think of allowing you to do that.'

"'Yes,' he insisted; 'pass it over, and I'll deliver it. I'm good at skipping these streets. I have done it ever since I was big enough to dodge an omnibus. Let me have it, quick!'

"I hesitated a moment, then handed him the note.

"'Phillips and Lockshaw!' said he, his grey eyes snapping, and he scowled a little. 'Well, I'll probably be here when you get back.'

"I returned very soon, but he was not there. Phillips and Lockshaw were both there, and very red in the face, too, for a wholesale firm.

"'Did Mr. Wolfe bring a note for me?' I inquired.

"'Yes,' replied my clients, both in the same breath.

"'What was your answer?

"'Well, you see, he asked me,' said Lockshaw, 'before I saw the note, if we could let you off from our engagement, whatever it was, for a few days. I told him that we couldn't possibly release you, because we wanted you to go to Wisconsin and attach some goods. The minute I said that, he threw down the note and went out of our office almost on a run.'

"'You have defeated yourselves!' said I, to the great terror of the wholesale firm. 'He will get ahead of us, sure.'

"'But you must run!' said Mr. Lockshaw.

"'You mustn't sleep nor eat day nor night!' said Phillips, in his excitement, anxious to contribute his utmost to assist me.

"'Gentlemen,' said I, 'you had better see Mr. Wolfe, and agree to have me collect for all of you. In the mean time, I will get on the train, and you can come there to report.'

"I had been aboard about ten minutes, when, just as the cars were moving off, my clients came running up, and being unable to explain in words, they did so by signs; Mr. Phillips shaking his head, which I interpreted to mean that I was to neither eat nor sleep, and that he had not agreed with Wolfe. Mr. Lockshaw, at the same time, was nodding vigorously, and moved me on with his hands; which I took to mean that he approved of me, indorsed my course, wished to convey the company's blessings, and desired me, without fail, to outstrip Wolfe's man, and circumvent all their enemies.

"'A bothering pair,' said I to myself—'a couple of skrimpy patterns, cut out of poor cloth. Both of their bodies and brains are not worth the little finger of old Wolfe—the hothead!'

"I felt unpleasant and dissatisfied; because, if I succeeded in Phillips and Lockshaw's case, I would most likely fail in my own suit with Wolfe's daughter, for he was a man of strong passion, and Fanny had plenty of her father's spirit.

"What added to my anxiety was the fact that Mr. Wolfe had met with some Western losses, and did not feel very amiable. He had always relied on me in difficult cases, and I felt now as if my position would not be fully understood—that he could not, or would not, look on professional honor as I did.

"But the cars soon shook these thoughts out of me, as we banged along through dust and dirt all night and next day; and the next night we came into the range of the cool lake winds, and so on to Chicago—hungry, flaccid, and sleepy.

"I had looked through the train for Mr. Wolfe's lawyer, but failed to find any one I knew, and concluded that I was ahead, thus far at least; so I registered my name in full, and went to bed.

"'My friend,' said I, speaking to the clerk in a style somewhat prevalent thereabout, as I came down rather late next morning—'my friend, why didn't you call me as I ordered? I wanted to take the Lake Shore train for Wisconsin.'

"'You changed your order, sir,' said the clerk. 'You told us you did not want to go.'

"'No, sir,' said I, 'begging your pardon, I did not change my order.'

"'It is so marked here,' he replied, showing me the slate. 'Order changed—needn't call—stays to-morrow.'"

"'You have made an entry against the wrong name,' said I.

"'This is not the gentleman,' said another clerk, coming up. 'The gentleman who changed Mr. Riley's order paid his bill, and has taken the Lake shore train. Here is his name—C. Wakefield, New York.'

"Wakefield and I have never met, though he knew Fanny. He was undoubtedly Wolfe's lawyer, and had got ahead of me. 'Give me my bill, quicker than lightning,' said I.

"'But don't you want your breakfast?' replied the clerk; 'the train has gone.'

"'No, I want my bill; that's all I want in this house.'

"'It was a mistake, sir, that no one could help,' said he, writing.

"'I understand what it was,' said I, 'but I'll try to help it, if you will give me my bill'—and, throwing down the money, I seized my valise and started.

"'Here, take me to the Lake Shore train on a dead run, and don't stop for anything,' said I to a coachman at the foot of the stairs. 'Ten dollars if you make the train,' I shouted through the front window of the coach after I got in. He did not hear, and I punched him. He came to a dead stop of course. 'Ten dollars if you reach the train,' I repeated. It is wonderful, now I think of it coolly, what a difference that made. He had been figuring it up, and concluded that by missing the train he would get a fare back; but now, by reaching it, he would get five fares in one. It seemed as if the coach and the horses heard my offer, and instantly put forth individual exertions, somewhat in harmony with the driver, to earn the money; for I commenced rocking, dancing, and jumping about, like an acrobat trying to drive through both doors and the front window at one leap.

"I think the people in the streets must have had a vague idea that the coach contained a pair of boots wrestling with a hat—the boots being, most of the time, on top. People at crossings dodged out of the way in angry amazement, and the very dogs ran into the gutters, looking back over their shoulders, wondering what ailed the coach.

"'Hold on, driver!' said I, punching him again. 'I don't want a funeral in our family just yet.'

"'All right,' said he, whipping his horses, thinking I was urging him on.

"'Hold on! hold on! You fool!' I shouted, pulling his coat-tails through the window and tugging at them. 'You'll kill me.'

"'Yes,' he yelled, 'I'll kill 'em or make it!' and, jumping to his feet, he lashed his horses to the highest pitch, and brought me alongside the moving train.

"'Now then!' he cried, tearing open the door; and jumping out, I clambered on the platform, and threw down a twenty-dollar bill, which he picked up, tipping his hat in acknowledgment.

"'Well, Mr. C. Wakefield, what do you think of this?' said I, soliloquizing as I cuddled down in my seat. 'If I do not beat you, then my name is not Riley, and there are no snakes in Texas.'

"I had hoped, until now, that Wells & Co. would pay up and save trouble, or that some sort of a compromise would be made between the New York claimants; but it was idle to hope any longer. I must be prepared to meet and overcome all sorts of schemes and games; and, as the first discreditable trick to detain me in Chicago, by changing my order so that I should miss the train, had failed of its object, and exposed Mr. C. Wakefield's presence and designs, I must expect to meet almost any obstacle that could be placed in my way for a less sum than fifteen thousand dollars.

"That was the prize for which we now both struggled, and half an hour's delay might defeat me; so I called up the conductor, and questioned him particularly about the place where we were to stop. I found out where to go for a good dinner, the best livery team, and the sharpest lawyer.

"I walked back to the hind platform of the last car, and slipped off with my valise before the train had fairly stopped. I went directly to a comfortable little public house, frequented by farmers, principally, and, ordering dinner, I immediately consulted Mr. Benway, the best lawyer to be found, paying him one hundred dollars down, with assurance of more. In two hours the papers were drawn; dinner was over, and we were riding across the prairie toward Well & Co.,s store. I had fairly distanced Wakefield, and felt good. Added to this emotion of triumph was an indiscribable sense of freedom from restraint, and an exhilerating feeling of roominess, in the wide, grassy, echoless plain; and there was a tonic, too, in the winds that blew out of the boundless horizon.

"We were riding along at a rapid pace when I saw a man standing on a knoll, some distance to the right, shouting and beckoning us that way.

"It is the sheriff,' said Benway, as we drew near, 'and he has got something over in the slough—a deer or a horse-thief, I'll bet, for he is death on both.'

"We rode up on the rise of ground, and, looking over into the slough saw two horses mired, and on the other side was a man covered with mud, and limping off through the grass, evidently quite lame.

"'What's the matter?' said Benway.

"'That's a counterfeiter,' replied the sheriff. 'I was chasing him, and we both rode down in there, pell-mell, and got mired—blast his pictur.'

"The counterfeiter's horse had struggled out to our side, and was shaking himself.

"'Here" said the sheriff, taking the horse by the bridle, and pulling a pistol from the saddle pocket, 'you go round, Benway, and head him off. No you needn't though, for I understand his dodges, and can do better. You stay here;'—and, mounting the counterfeiter's horse, he rode round the end of the slough, a hundred rods off, and came up in front of the man, who turned back toward us again.

"'Now, see here,' said the fellow, cocking a large pistol, 'you'd better keep off.'

"'No, I guess not,' said the sheriff, 'I think I'd better keep on. I've been hunting you too long. I've grown fond of you, and fairly hanker after your fascinating face. I couldn't think of giving up my game just as it is ready to bag, you know.'

"'But you may go into the bag, that's all,' said the man. 'I'll shoot, if you don't keep off.'

"'No, now,' replied the sheriff, riding up nearer; 'you wouldn't do that before witnessess.'

"The fellow looked over at us; and a sullen face it was too, his coarse, black eyebrows covering a third of his forehead, and growing clear across the top of his nose; then he turned suddenly to the sheriff and fired. The horse jumped as if he had been shot at before, and, wheeling about, threw his rider on the ground, and the counterfeiter started on a run again.

"'So that's your game, is it?' said the sheriff. 'I only want to know what your game is, so as to play according to rule;'—and, drawing his pistol, he snapped it at the fellow, but it missed fire. Throwing it down, he dashed after the man, and, coming up to him as he struggled through the tall tangled grass, near the slough, he seized him by his arms behind, and threw him down. We had started on a run too, and, coming up, we tied his arms with a handkerchief.

"In the grass close by, Benway and I found two fifteen-thousand-dollar packages of counterfeit bills, one of which we claimed as our share of prize money. In the fellow's saddle-pockets the sheriff found plates, engraving tools, and dies.

"'You are a captain' I guess,' said the sheriff. 'Hold out your hands here, and let me put on these bracelets. There you are now,' continued he, standing back to admire him, as if he had been a statue of the Greek Slave—'there you are now, all ready for court, with your regular uniform on, and the jury won't disagree a minute when they come to see your face, I think.'

"'Well, now, Benway,' said he, turning to us, 'what have you got to drink, and where are you going?'

"Having satisfied the sheriff on the first point, Benway said, 'We are going out to attach Wells & Co.'s goods, and you must go with us.'

"'Their store is closed,' replied the sheriff; 'I just came through there.'

"'Then we must break down the door,' said Benway.

"'But can you give bonds?' he inquired.

"'Yes, I represent the house of Phillips and Lockshaw, good for a hundred thousand dollars, and I have one thousand here in my pocket, just to make things go easy.'

"'All right,' said the sheriff, briskly—'down goes their door. Now one of you take our handsome friend into the buggy, while the other rides his nag.' So I mounted the horse; the sheriff caught and mounted his; and falling into line, with the buggy ahead, we moved on again.

"What we had most to fear now was that Wells & Co. would make an assignment, and leave us to fight it out with a mob of claimants, and get little or nothing at last. So we hurried along; but it soon came on dark, then darker, and finally black; and we lost our way.

"'I believe we are going round and round,' said the sheriff.

"'No, I think we must be all right,' said Benway, 'for the mud has come on the left side of my face ever since dark.'

"'See here' my friend, you are a night bird,' said the sheriff to the counterfeiter. "Can't you do something handsome, and smell your way out of this scrape?'

"'Yes,' said he, 'if you'll let me get on my horse, he and I can take you to the Fox Crossing on a bee-line.'

"'You are a very intellectual young man, considering your occupation,' said the sheriff, 'and your kind intentions do you honor; but I guess we'll take the will for the deed, and find our own way out.'

"'What are you doing now?' inquired Benway of the sheriff, who was dismounted, and down in the grass.

"'Spreading a newspaper,' he replied. 'I want to see if we shall come to it again, for I believe we are playing circus here;'—and about a hundred yards farther on he spread out the other half of the paper.

"We went on again, through the endless, everlasting grass, and in about an hour came to the paper,—the horses snorting and turning one side to avoid it; and then we came to the other piece.

"'This won't do,' said the sheriff. 'We have beat down a road, and the horses have followed it round and round. Let us camp;'—and, spreading his horse-blanket, we sat down on it near the buggy.

"'Not quite so noisy as New York,' said he, after a long silence, 'but it's better. I've tried 'em both, and just for a place to live in, now, I wouldn't give this prairie for the whole island, from Spuyten Duyvil down.'

"Then we sat there a long time, silently watching the sky; and presently, where the clouds grew thin and vapory, the moon came slowly out, shining full in our faces.

"'Good morning, good morning!' said the sheriff, kissing his hand to her, as he rose to his feet. 'Now let's face about,' he continued, 'and keep the good old girl straight behind us, and we shall go all right.'

"We had gone but a short distance when he said: 'I hear horses behind, and I guess they are counterfeiters, come to rescue the prisoner. If they are part of your gang,' said he to the counterfeiter, 'and attempt to rescue you, I give you fair notice that the father of your children may get hurt unless you keep quiet.' The man did not speak, but I heard the chain on his handcuffs rattle a little.

"'Who is that?' asked one of the horsemen, riding up behind.

"'Some travelers,' replied the sheriff.

"'You are out rather late. Have you met the sheriff?' asked the horseman.

"'Ah, ha!' said that official, in a low voice, drawing his pistol, and cocking it; 'I've a devilish good mind to pepper the scoundrels. Are you loaded, Benway?'

"'No, I have no pistol,' he replied in a low tone.

"'I'm sorry, because we couldn't very well hit amiss among them fellows,' said the sheriff, 'for they are a desperate gang. I believe it would save the country several thousand dollars' expense of grand and petit jurors, and board in jail, if I could only make a centre shot, now.'

"'I say, have you seen the sheriff?' said the horseman again, riding still nearer, but keeping within easy reach of his companions.

"'See here!' said the sheriff, reining his horse suddenly around in the path before them. 'I'm the sheriff of this county, myself; and I weigh a hundred and eighty pounds, when I'm light! I've got one of your gang in irons—the Great Mugwump himself, I reckon—strongly guarded by men armed to the teeth; so you just ride up here and surrender, or we'll blow you through, and kill old Mug too. Ride up here now, or we'll fire.'

"Instead of obeying this sanguinary order, one of the party sang out. 'Ho-ho-hold on now, she-sheriff! don't shoo-shoot your friends!'

"'Bah!' said the sheriff, lowering his pistol and turning about disgusted, 'it's Old Royce. I wonder what's up now.'

"'Who is it?' said I to Benway.

"'It is Roswell Lewis, a lawyer,' he replied. 'We call him Old Royce. He's out on that attachment suit against Wells & Co, and your friend Wakefield is with him, probably. Here, sheriff,' said Benway, 'ride back and give him this bottle: that will unlock his brains if anything can.'

"'That's pretty good,' said Old Royce, 'and tastes like imported. My friend Wakefield here never takes anything; so I guess I'll drink for him. I've always had to do double duty in the world. By the way,' he continued, 'I must tell you a good dodge that my friend here came on a pigwidgeon lawyer down in Chicago. This lawyer was trying to get ahead of my friend here, and had left orders to be called for the morning train, but what does my friend here do but go and have the order changed—do you see?—and so the little pigwidgeon is left behind. It's just such little touches of genius as that, sheriff, that redeems human nature, and makes us more than brutes. He'll make fifteen thousand dollars by it. Hallo, what's your hurry, sheriff? I can't keep up if you're going to trot, you know. This horse was made on purpose for a circus, I guess. He'd do all the square jumping up and down to music, but he ain't worth shucks to go ahead. He's a humpy horse, and I believe my brains would all be shaken into my boots if I rode him another day;'—and he grumbled away in the same strain till we got out of hearing, and afterward, I presume.

"In two hours more we reached the Fox, and forded it, and found a sleepy ostler in the hotel; but on looking in the buggy for my valise, I found it was gone, and it contained all my papers. We had probably left it by the slough. Here was a bad fix; for when it came daylight, Wakefield would attach, of course.

"'What shall we do, Benway?' said I. 'Can't you invent some plausible story to detain them?'

"'It looks to me,' he replied, 'as if we were to be defeated at last. I'll send some men to look for the valise, and we'll see what can be done after that; but I know old Royce well, and when his head is clear again he'll be sharp enough—to use his own phrase—to shave hogs with a feather.'

"I felt desperate now, for I had come to look on the matter as fairly under my control, and had already set Wakefield down as defeated; but here the tables were to be turned with a vengeance, and my enemy was to triumph.

"'Benway,' said I, when he came back, 'I have got them, I guess. You say that Wells boards in this house and that you are intimate with him. Go to him with this fifteen thousand dollars in counterfeit money, and tell him Old Royce is going to attach his goods. Then give him the money, with instructions to be counting it over in his room, while you tell Royce that now is his time to attach, because Wells has sold out and is counting his money up stairs. Tell Wells that, if he plays his part properly, he will settle the Wolfe claim very soon."

"Benway hesitated a moment, then said, 'Well, under the circumstances I guess I will, for we are dealing with unscrupulous fellows.' So when breakfast was over I saw Benway talking with Wells, and soon after with Royce, who immediately went to the deputy-sheriff.

"'Now then,' said Royce to this official, after getting him out in the horse-shed, with Wakefield, 'what we want is grit. We must break down the door and grab all the money we see; and mind you, if he puts it in his pocket we must pull it out of his pocket, that's all. Business is business, and this is big business, and you must be gritty. There are moments of destiny,' said he, pulling a bottle from his pocket, and taking a long drink, 'and this is one of 'em.'

"The whole party came back looking pale, and the deputy started ahead, old Royce Lewis following next, and Wakefield closing up the rear on the stairway. Shortly after they disappeared we heard the door crashed in, and a scrambling rush followed.

"We afterwards learned from the deputy, a jovial fellow, that Old Royce was the first man in the room, and that, after grabbing what money he could hold in each hand, he knocked the balance on to the floor and sat down on all he could cover, shouting to the deputy, 'I've got the pile; attach me! attach me!'—moving his elbows up and down, meanwhile, like a young crow trying in vain to fly. When they came down stairs, flushed with triumph, Mr. Lewis took occasion to recount his twenty-five years' experience at the bar, which seemed to have been years of triumphs for him, and an uninterrupted series of defeats for all his opponets. After this more convivality, more stories, more triumphs at the bar, but no one suspected the money.

"Meantime the men returned with the valise just as Royce Lewis, Wakefield, and the deputy were leaving town with the money, and they had but fairly crossed the river when Wells invited us all up to his store to celebrate the success of the trick just played.

"Wells was very jolly; and that mysterious and hitherto invisible being called 'Co.' came out strong. He even went so far as to say that he guessed 'Wells didn't eat no snow,' which meant, probably, that he slaked his thirst and satisfied his appetite by the more economical and time-saving methods usual among men.

"'Here, take some more all around,' urged Wells. 'This last drive was the best I ever came on any one."

"'Yes,' said Benway, walking up to the desk and looking at the papers, sharply, 'it was good—first rate—even for the West, where we manage to keep ahead in business; but I believe the sheriff can show you a better one.'

"'I shouldn't wonder if I could,' replied the sheriff, walking up to Wells and serving the papers.

"The man who 'didn't eat snow' looked so white for a moment that a stranger would have thought that snow was his regular food—in fact, that he ate nothing else. But the next moment he turned to Benway, fiercely, and said, 'You scoundrel, you got in here by fraud; it's a swindle; I won't stand it. I've a mind to knock you down, sir.'

"'No, don't now, Wells,' said Benway; 'it is too expensive for you, under your present circumstances. We should have got in here any way, and you merely saved a door by the operation; that's all.'

"'Not all, exactly,' said Wells; 'for I should have made an assignment and beaten you.'

"'Yes, I see it is all ready,' said Benway, taking up some papers from the desk; 'but I'm pleased to notice that your very valuable autographs are not attached. Wells, you are a gentleman, and I'm sorry you've had bad luck; but you'll come out.'

"After securing two trusty men to take charge of the store, we hunted, fished, smoked, and talked away the day, and rode back to the lake over the prairie next day. The first man we saw was old Royce Lewis.

"'Where is your friend Wakefield?' inquired Benway.

"'The man who came that stunning game over the pigwidgeon lawyer,' said the sheriff.

"'Why, he went off on the morning train, with orders to have the money deposited here in bank,' replied Royce.

"'So he thinks it's all right, then.'

"'Of course,' replied Royce, contemptuously. 'And I made a good fee out of the case.'

"'Yes,' said the deputy, coming up, 'you were so very smart that you took your fee out of counterfeit money,'

"This came so unexpectedly, and was received with such shouts of laughter, that the old man, for the first time in his life, perhaps, had nothing to say, and hurried off without attempting a reply.

"I finished my business, and took the next train East. I found Phillips and Lockshaw excited, as usual. They had learned from Mr. Wolfe that his claim had been collected in money, and they were much relieved, if not pleased, on hearing the true state of the case.

"I met Wolfe on the street near my office.

"'So I beat you, Riley, after all,' said he; 'but allow me to say, sir, that I don't think you did the fair thing by me. You might have said at once that you were going out there for Phillips and Lockshaw.'

"'But, sir,' I replied, 'I had been retained by them in the case, and was bound to protect them by concealing their designs.'

"'I don't think so,' he replied; 'besides, they could stand the loss, and I can't.'

"'Mr. Wolfe,' said I, 'I should as soon think of embezzling my client's money, as I would of intentionally revealing any of the secrets confided to me as a lawyer.'

"Next morning, when I met Wolfe, he not only refused to acknowledge my salutation, but was actually almost purple with rage. He had received a letter from Royce Lewis, stating that the money was counterfeit.

"I lost no time in calling on Fanny, but found her not at home. I excused that, thinking she might have been out; but the next day I saw her in the street, and she avoided me.

"I wrote her a brief, but vigorous note, explaining my posi-

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JUNE 1, 1867.

A MILITARY POLICE—STATE INTERFERENCE IN MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS.

SOME of the democratic papers of New York, seem to contemplate the arming and drilling of the Metropolitan Police as a military body, with feelings of zealous alarm. "The police force of this city," says the Atlas, "once a purely popular organization, has been, by degrees, subjected to a more and more perfect military discipline until at last we are to have a Brigade of Police, armed and drilled as regular troops. This is a startling innovation and would have been strenuously opposed a few years ago as aping a monarchical institution unfitted for a republican country. The duties of the policeman and the citizen soldier have hitherto been kept scrupulously distinct, and the confounding of them now under the control of a Commission created by the State and in no wise responsible to the people of the city is not a movement in the direction of popular liberty."

To a disinterested observer, familiar with the history of the city of New York for the last few years, and with its present political and social condition, it would seem as though the better class of its population had more eminent perils to dread than any that are likely to arise from the increased efficiency and power of the police force. As to the interposition of the State Legislature by the creation of a Police Commission, beyond the control of a mere municipal majority, we are by no means certain that interference of a similar kind, but extending to more matters than those affecting police organizations, will not ultimately become a necessity in all the large cities of the United States. Thus far, experience seems to indicate that under our system of government it is the fate of the great centers of commerce and population gradually to fall under the control of the worst class of corrupt politicians, who, by their influence with a comparatively ignorant majority, hold the rights of the minority at their mercy. If San Francisco thus far furnishes an exception, the fact may, perhaps, find an explanation in exceptional circumstances in her history. "The Police Board," says the Atlas, "is gradually absorbing all power, and it promises in a few years to exercise unlimited military authority. If this is republicanism it is of a new fangled kind which can scarcely be distinguished by old-fashioned eyes, from that which our fathers called despotism."

It is not, we are sure, the respectable and industrious portion of the population of any American city that are troubled by apprehensions of a "police despotism." There is a despotism, however, of quite a different description which they have good reason to dread—the despotism of an ignorant or depraved majority under the control of petty demagogues who make municipal politics a trade, and municipal office the means of obtaining a living by corrupt bargaining, contract selling and place brokering. In a city where such scenes as those of the anti negro, and the outrages that attended the last celebration at "St. Patrick's Day," in New York, are liable to occur, it seems to us that the police force cannot well be too powerful or too thoroughly organized.

A ROMAN CATHOLIC THEORY OF TOLERATION.

THE Monitor, a weekly paper published in this city, which claims to be "the only Irish or Catholic journal on this coast," has undertaken to justify the recent action of the Peruvian government in refusing to permit the public exercise of any worship except that of the Roman Catholic Church within its jurisdiction. The reasoning of the Monitor, if not remarkable for logical force, is worthy of the serious consideration of all American citizens who value freedom of opinion and belief, upon grounds quite distinct from its intrinsic merits.

"An entirely Catholic community," so the argument commences, "in which the people believe every tittle of their common faith to have been revealed by God, must consider apostacy from the Church as an act opposed to morality, and may, therefore, logically prohibit such being done publicly, or any attempt to bring it about, as the erection of temples for other worship is. If a man's conscientious opinions lead him into acts contrary to public decency as established in the community of which he is a member, such acts are and must be restrained by law, as polygamy is prohibited in the United States, though its lawfulness is conscientiously held by Mormons and Mahometans. On the same principle Catholic States may prohibit the open introduction of new doctrines. Catholicity being established on the principle that all men are bound to believe what the Church teaches, considers wilful disbelief as sinful, and accordingly its public toleration is entirely a question of expediency. Protestantism, established on the principle that every man has a right to form his own creed, must, in consistency, allow each to worship in his own manner. Thus the case is widely different in a Catholic country and a Protestant one. For instance, in the United States, where there is no commonly received religion, Unitarians and Episcopalians, Calvinists and Armenians, Baptists, and Methodists, are as opposite as the poles, and mutual toleration is a matter of necessity; but in Peru, where the entire population is Catholic, it is no hardship or tyranny for them to remain so by their own will."

The wide difference thus coolly declared to exist, in regard to religious toleration, between "a Catholic Country and a Protestant one," amounts according to the Monitor, to precisely this, that in the Catholic Country, religious freedom cannot consistently be allowed to Protestants, while in the Protestant Country it must be granted to Catholics. This theory may be a very satisfactory one to Roman Catholics; but we doubt much whether American Protestants are, as yet, fully prepared to accept it with the meekness that seems to be expected of them. Unless it is considered that unusual concessions are due to extraordinary arrogance, and that a title to exceptional privileges may be established by exceptional pretensions, Americans will be slow in yielding assent to the proposition that Romanists have a right to suppress Protestant worship wherever they have the power to do so and may deem the exercise of that power expedient. For the claim of "the only Irish or Catholic journal" is nothing less than this. "A Catholic legislator," it declares, in the same article from which we have quoted above, "in a purely political point of view, must view them" (religious innovations) "with distrust, and, if possible, endeavor to prevent their introduction; though if they once become established, it is usually more expedient to tolerate them." And in the next sentence we are gravely assured that "though toleration is thus only a question of expediency in Catholic Countries, and as against Protestantism," it is to be regarded as "a right in Protestant ones"

However consistent this theory may be with the traditional pretensions of the Church of Rome, it is clear that it is at war with the principle of religious freedom, and that it threatens the rights of minorities wherever Roman Catholics are in the majority. The saving clause to the effect that though it is the duty of the Catholic legislator to prevent the introduction of doctrines not approved by the Church, yet if once established, "it is usually more expedient to tolerate them," furnishes a feeble security indeed, to persons holding such doctrines. The question of expediency is one that admits of being viewed in many lights, and is greatly affected by the question of opportunity and power. Let the principle be conceded that freedom of worship cannot be claimed as a right in countries where the powers of government are wielded by Roman Catholics, that toleration under such circumstances is a mere question of expediency, and there is too much reason to conclude that the suppression of religious freedom would be found to be expedient wherever it is practicable.

THE Santa Clara News is the name of a new paper recently established at the town of Santa Clara, Santa Clara county. It is a large sheet, handsomely made up, attractive in its typographical appearance, and is edited with judgment and ability. In politics it is Republican. The name of John M. Sullivan, well known in this State as an experienced journalist, appears at the head of its columns, as editor.

A "STEINWAY" VICTORIOUS.—A telegram was received in this city from Paris during the present week announcing that the first premium of the World's Fair, a gold medal, was awarded to a Steinway piano. Chickering received the second premium

A POETICAL PUZZLE.

IN nearly all of Mr. Swinburne's earlier poems, there was a large element of that kind of obscurity, that affects even the critic who has been accustomed to cherish the complacent belief that there can be no intelligible meaning where he finds himself puzzled to discover any, with an uneasy doubt as to whether the difficulty lies in the author's depth, or in his own dulness. Yet Mr. Swinburne's obscurity is of quite another kind than Browning's. There is no metaphysical element in it. It is passionate rather than philosophical, and seems to spring in part, at least, from the audacious struggle of an imagination at once subtle and fervid, to flash meanings upon the mind that are incapable of distinct expression in words, or to produce impressions by the use of unintelligible language, (unintelligible in the sense that no meaning can be reached by the process of verbal analysis) that could not be produced by the use of intelligible language..

There is a poetic obscurity that springs from weakness, of which it would be easy to point out any desired number of examples in contemporary writers; but there is also an obscurity that has its origin in the highest intellectual and imaginative force, coupled with a spirit that delights in grappling with difficulties from which feebler natures shrink.

To the class of critics who cannot tolerate the use in poetical composition, of any phrase, or form of expression, or collocation of words that does not convey a distinct meaning and admit of rigid grammatical and rhetorical analysis, both Browning and Swinburne are of course, an abomination. Critics of this creed were sufficiently disgusted with "Chastellard," and "The Queen Mother," but the "Song of Italy," the poet's latest production, will prove still more exasperating, so far as we can judge from such portions of it as we have read.

There are, however, some exceedingly vigorous objurgatory passages in the poem, which are intelligible enough, particularly that in which the Pope is pictured as gloating over prostrate Italy. Other portions of the song, even after a second and third reading leave us as much mystified as ever, and yet not without a certain vague apprehension of a meaning such as may be felt in a strain of music, but cannot be translated into words.

A few extracts from the poem, upon which the reader can, if so inclined, exercise his ingenuity, will be found in the "Literary Gleanings" on another page of our present issue.

THE Pacific Churchman and the Monitor have had a brief controversial passage in reference to the recent charge of Bishop Kip, in which the latter paper assumed a highly offensive tone, and one singularly out of place, we should think, in a religous journal. Indeed, both the language and the spirit of the Monitor in speaking of the Churchman and the Episcopal Bishop of this diocese, were grossly discourteous, and not distinguishable from those of the less respectable class of partisan journals in their assaults upon political opponents. Our Roman Catholic fellow citizens are exceedingly sensitive in regard to any disrespectful allusion to their Church or its diguitaries, and their indignation would have been most vehement had any journal in this city ventured to speak of Arch-bishop Allemany in the strain of coarse levity employed by the Monitor toward Bishop Kip. Those who are so prompt in resenting offences of this description, ought, one would think, to be guarded in their own conduct. It will scarcely do for persons who are utterly careless of showing courtesy to opponents, to be punctilious in exacting it for themselves.

THE entertainment to be given under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association, and for their benefit at Platt's Hall next week, promises to be of an unusually attractive character, besides being a decided novelty. The Association is to be congratulated on their judicious selection of a lady President for the occasion, whose skill and experience in such matters furnish a guaranty that all the arrangements will be conceived in good taste, and carried out with rare executive tact. The whole design, so far as the details have been made known, seems to be quite an original one, entirely out of the beaten track of Fairs and Festivals, which have been so frequent of late as to have become an intolerable bore. Among the novel features of the present entertainment, will be a "Corner Grocery," and an old fashioned "Yankee Tavern" both of which will be "character institutions" in every practicable detail.

THE REV. MR. SAVAGE, of Grass Valley, has charged Mrs. Laura Cuppy with having "in one breath asserted that Jesus Christ was the best and divinest man that ever lived, and in the next, that his whole mission was a humbug and an imposture, and himself a cheat, a hypocrite, and a liar." We are assured that Mrs. Cuppy never used this language, or any of similar import, and we fully credit the denial Mrs. Cuppy is a lady of education and refinement, and has no affinities with the scurrilous and blaspheming class of table-tippers. She denies the divinity of Jesus, but the language in which she presents her views of his character and mission, is scarcely distinguishable from that of Unitarians of the School of Theodore Parker, and it has always been characterized so far as we are informed, by a spirit of reverence and by perfect decorum of expression.

DIGNITY, NO. TWO.

BY PRENTICE.

DIGNITY appertains to some editors. I approach this phase of dignity with trepidation. I am bringing down jugs of wrath upon my head, yet it must be said ; some editors are dignified. Why is this? Why does a remorseless, impelling, unavoidable destiny compel me to write these things? Why am I the victim selected to give expression to certain ideas relative to editorial dignity. I see wo in the futnre. Yet I must write. It is inevitable. I am doomed.

The desire to publish and edit a paper is common to all humanity. Yet have we not all a right to aspire? Certainly. Is mental diminutiveness any bar to aspiration? Certainly not. The frog had a right to try and swell himself to the dimensions of the ox. He had also the right to burst. He did burst. The ox was not harmed. These editors have a right to be dignified. It requires an endless amount of skill, genius and executive power to edit a newspaper. Money is necessary ; but money is not all. Brains are somewhat useful ; but brains are not all. These things are well in their place. But in order to fuse the two into the proper combination, the Great Being, the Figure Head, the Divine Afflatus must be present to sit in the editorial chair, to represent the awful "We," to disburse the cash needful to keep going the machine, cursed with the brains, to entertain visitors, to chat with simple folks and literary people from afar, who retire wondering if that indeed be the God, to say unto Scrub, "Scrub thou art commanded, thou art ridden, the bit is in thy mouth, the saddle on thy back, Scrub there is barley in the manger for the pack-horse who works well in harness, and none for the balky nag, Scrub thou art commanded, Scrub write what things I tell unto the, pull down, build up, praise, blame, traduce, slander, villify, blacken, and tear from thy breast the remnant of that useless rag, conscience."

Yet if the gnat ride the elephant, shall not the gnat be dignified? You are angry my friend at the gnat for its assumption. Why do you look at it? How weak in you thus to be troubled by an insignificant insect though it be a mental blood-sucker. How foolish to be angry at such a grand comedy! Country editors are sometimes dignified. It is natural. Look at the Weekly Squab. It is owned and conducted by a man like the rest of us. He had a father and a mother. He was brought up in a civilized land. He was sent to a school. He learned to read, to write, to cipher up to the "Rule of Three." He has buzzed through grammar. He was once proficient in Geographical boundaries. He has trodden carefully on the outskirts of history. He once came near thinking for himself, but while treading upon the verge of an idea he was attacked by Political Partisanship. The malady took deep root. He is Democratic. He is Republican. It matters not. The seed is the same. So is the blossom. He treads three great avennes of thought, and three only, devotion to party, opposition to political opponents, and hostility to the few who think for themselves. The mountain of misty importance, weekly gives birth to the sickly ghost of a mouse. It is the Squab. There are five columns of quack advertisements terrible for youthful contemplation. There are the cards of the lawyer, the physician, the dentist. There are the advertisements of the butcher, the baker, the retailer of dry goods and groceries, and the candlestick makers, setting forth their wares, being the literary pabulum of the Squab most inviting to the palate of the readers.

But the original matter. Has not this man brains? Yes certainly, thin, frothy, translucent, but nevertheless brains. There they are rubbed over a column and a half of the inside, mixed with the refuse of old ideas, stirred to a paste, with just enough consistency to stick together. I hear a voice ever repeating the same drowsy speech. "Stay in this house. Men built it who could think. We cannot think." And meanwhile the flood is roaring and rising, the timbers creak and groan, the house rocks, even the rats are leaving it and traveling up the mountain side. In the midst of all this commotion, out steps the editor of the Squab, complacent and dignified. He deems himself one of the engineers of the flood. He imagines he has over it some control with his puny press. The gods laugh. But the editor of the Squab hears them not. All the villagers know him. He is the editor. He receives free tickets to balls, the circus, the menagarie, the comical exhibitions of negro minstrels, the panorama, and the learned pig. He is one of the great men at races and Fourth of July celebrations. It is a mark of honor to be able to "treat" him. No wonder he is dignified.

Dignity is a conspicuous appendage to schoolmasters. It cannot be wondered at. Their profession obliges them to cultivate dignity.

Youth is boisterous. It must be overawed. But you may say, "Spare this useful, inoffensive class of men. They train the youthful mind. Their employment should be regarded with respect." True. I am aware of this. Unhappy being that I am to be compelled to speak thus of the schoolteacher, because I once witnessed the antics of one solitary pedant! If he looked with contempt upon other men because of their inability to pounce like a hawk upon a required rule of grammar or the rule for the proper pronunciation of words of four syllables ending in tion, or give the proper definition of a letter, or tell with exasperatiug correctuess which is the Northernmost cape in Europe, the longest river and the highest mountain in the world, is that any reason why I should regard his brethren as possessed with similar peculiarities? I am astonished at such inconsistency. This man thought nothing could be taught outside of the schoolhouse.

What to him was the forest? A place for runaway boys to go birdnesting. And the brooks and rivers? Places where case hardened urchins fished, bathed, and occasianally got drowned. Nature to him was only legitimate when bound in calf. Wisdom and learning could only be found between book covers. The end and aim of education was more successfully to "get on" in life. Naughty, idle boys died poor. The industrious, studious and good left for the kingdom of Heaven rich, or at least in good circumstances. Yet, how narrow and contracted that mind must be to assume from this that all, or a majority of pedagogues think similarly.

Virtue in this man, lay in grammatical correctness. Vice lay in the improper use of adverbs. Total depravity in substituting the objective for the nominative case.

I did not wish my boy crammed with moral philosophy at the age of eight years. To him I ventured to say this. I knew not the peril of such a course. I trod upon his inflamed dignity. He knew what he was about. Was he not an educator by trade? Had he not taken the dimensions, the depth, the breadth and the capacity of my boy's brain with his square and compass?

He contended that no man could become a good citizen and discharge his duties to himself and to society without a thorough knowledge of algebra. Was not Napoleon a mathematical genius? said he. But I did not want my boy a Napoleon. He looked at me with amazement and contempt, and adjusting his immense burthen of dignity on his back as a pedlar does his pack, strode heavily and majestically away.

There is first class journalistic dignity. There are people who, when walking on stilts, imagine they are above their fellows. Well, are they not? Yes, but the legs are of wood and there may be an assimilating quality of the head. At all events, when these apparent intellectual giants looked up to by Tom, Dick and Harry, with so much awe and reverence, are tripped up by a four line squib, they do seem very ridiculous, especially when they attempt to rise with the stilts still strapped to them.

THE PRICE OF PAINTINGS IN SAN FRANCISCO.—The artists' sale of oil paintings by Duncan & Co., on Friday evening, was largely attended and the entire catalogne sold. The list embraced all of Marple's best pictures and those of Arriola & Denny. Fifty-two paintings were disposed of, the principle ones at the following prices: "Pilot-boat Cruising," by Denny, $22½ ; "North Dome," by Marple, $59 ; Landscape, by Marple, $35 ; "Two Domes," by Marple, $42½ ; "View in Spring Valley," by Marple, $31 ; "Pilot-boat Caleb Curtis Cruising," by Denny, $36; "Job's Peak," by Marple, $56 ; "Volcano," by Arriola, $50 ; "Sly Park," by Marple, $72½ ; "Farallones," by Denny, $22½ ; "Kenilworth Castle," by Arriola, $80 ; "Yosemite Falls," by Marple, $105 ; "Napa Creek," by Marple, $65 ; "Helmet Rock," by Arriola, $150 ; "Coast near Monterey," by Denny, $25 ; "Russian River Valley," by Marple, 2 views at $50 and $55 ; "Mazatlan," by Arriola, $150 ; "North side of Yosemite," by Marple, $57½ ; "Ruins in Italy," by Arriola, $90 ; "Starr King Yosemite," by Marple, $75 ; "Fallen Leaf Lake," by Marple, $40 ; "Scene on the Stanislaus," by Denny, $50 ; 2 heads, "Hits at the Fashions," by Arriola. $25 and $26 ; "El Capitano," by Marple, $32½. The sale footed up over $2,000.

THE Commencement Exercises of the Latin High School will take place this evening, at a quarter before eight o'clock, at Lincoln Hall, corner of Market and fifth streets. Mr. George Easton, who has carried off the "first honor" of his class, will deliver the Valedictory, with an oration on "The Late Struggle." Mr. Melville H. Regensburger, who took the "second honor," pronounces the Latin Salutatory; and orations on "Treason," Ambition," "Julius Cæsar," "American Aristocracy," "Physical Education," and "Classical Studies," will be delivered by Messrs. Frank E. White, Joseph Mee, Charles B. Learned, Sidney Worth, George E. Davis, and Edward Blaney, respectively. The Roll of Honor for the term ending May 6th, 1867, embraces the names of James Lankershim, Jacob Rienstien, Edward Blaney, John L. Scudder, and H. M. Caldwell, in the first grade, and Harrison A. Jones and Joseph C. Rowell, in the second grade.

MISS PITTSINGER'S READING.—Miss Pittsinger gave a reading of origiual and selected articles at the Mechanics' Institute Hall last Wednesday evening. The lady poetess claims our sympathy. She has several times before in this capacity, ventured to entertain the public. It is evident she lacks the assistance and advice of a true friend. Miss Pittsinger's style is rich, striking, and full of originality. A little of it goes a grdat way. She may yet succeed in this vocation, and show another example of the wonders which may be accomplished by patience, boldness and perseveraunce.

ITALIAN OPERA.

SINCE our last review three new operas have been produced—La Favorita on Friday and Saturday, I Martiri on Monday, and Il Barbiere di Siviglia on Wednesday. In La Favorita, Mme. Stella Bonheur made a very favorable impression as "Leonora," dressing the character magnificently, acting with great force, and singing the music in a style to which we can offer no objection except in regard to the tremulousness already noticed. She was frequently applauded ; and the duet with Signor Mancusi ("Alphonso") in the second act was encored on Friday evening, while that in the last scene with Signor Limberti ("Fernando") excited equal enthusiasm on Saturday. The general effect of the performance was not sufficiently good on either night to merit further notice. I Martiri was tolerably well rendered, and the duet between Signorina Brambilla ("Paolina") and Signor Limberti ("Poliuto") in the last act was given with such intensity of voice and action as to receive a unanimous encore.

The representation of Il Barbiere was a brilliant success, the cast comprising nearly the whole strength of the company. Signorina Brambilla displayed wonderful execution in the florid music assigned to "Rosina," and in the lesson scene she introduced two favorite concert waltzes, which were immensely applauded. Signor Bianchi as "Almaviva," Signor Mancusi as "Figaro," M. Roncovieri as "Dr. Bartolo," and (last but by no means least) Signor Milleri as "Don Basilio," were all unusually excellent ; the orchestra and chorus were good, and the whole performance a thoroughly enjoyable one.

Il Trovatore was played last night for the third time, constituting the final regular performance of a season in which we find much to praise, though we have felt obliged to be severe sometimes in our criticism of details. Un Ballo in Maschera will be given this evening as an extra performance. The second seasou is postponed until week after next ; meantime L' Africaine and other new operas will be carefully rehearsed, and we may expect a high degree of completeness when they are finally brought before the impatient public.

"MARK TWAIN'S" BOOK.—Our popular California humorist, whose sketches in THE CALIFORNIAN first won an Eastern recognition of his genius, has collected a number of his best pieces in this elegant volume of some one hundred and ninety odd pages. The book embraces, besides the "Jumping Frog," the "Launching of the Steamer Capital," better known, perhaps, as the "History of the Traveling Panorama," the "Story of The Little Bad Boy Who Didn't Come to Grief," "Among the Spirits," "Literature In the Dry Diggings," "The Killing of Julius Cæsar Localized," and twenty other pieces in the same vein. The author is too well known to the Californian public to require the introduction, of "John Paul," who somewhat unnecessarily appears in a prefatory "advertisement" as editor of the volume. One of the most characteristic features of "Mark Twain's" humor is the basis of shrewd observation, hard good sense, and keen, yet by no means cynical, perception of the foibles of character, that underlies it, giving it a certain value and significance quite independent of its power to excite the risibilities.

The greater portion of the sketches that compose the present volume appeared originally in THE CALIFORNIAN, but they are not of the ephemeral quality that cannot endure the test of a second reading. The dedication of the book is eminently characteristic, and since it is as brief as it is original in conception and style, we will give it entire. Here it is: "To John Smith, whom I have known in Divers and Sundry Places about the World, and whose many and Manifold Virtues did ever Command my Esteem, I Dedicate this Book. It is said that the man to whom a volume is dedicated, always buys a copy. If this prove true in the present instance, a princely affluence is about to burst upon—The Author."

The book may be obtained at H. H. Bancroft & Co's.

LAST EVENING'S Bulletin, in an article entitled "The Opposition to the People's Movement," evinces some little of that "campaign spirit" which reminds us unpleasantly of the temper that characterized in "early days." Duriug the last few years there has been a noticeable advance in the tone and character of San Francisco journalism. But it is a significant fact that on the eve of every municipal election, a marked retrogade tendency is developed. The passions and prejudices stimulated into activity by political contests, seem to be too strong for the restraints imposed by the laws of journalistic decorum, and in the article alluded to, the Bulletin breaks out in the coarse strain which belongs rather to its old traditions than the better reputation which it has earned. "Who is George C. Gorham," it asks, "that the people of San Francisco should take him for a Dictator? What has the cunning little wire-worker from Yuba done to entitle him to the sufferages of this great city?" etc. This is not exactly the style of political "discussion" which the better class of its readers have of late years been accustomed to look for in the Bulletin.

escape, as soon almost as the intention was formed, and then he threw himself forwards rapidly in a sort of low trot, his body nearly on the ground, and his nose very close to it. Thus he darted on with more swiftness than could be expected from his creeping position, taking very short but astonishingly quick steps, in an oblique direction, so as to head the bull at the nearest possible point, which he unerringly did, and when he met him he made no noise, and used no force or violence of any kind. It seemed to be quite sufficient that their eyes should meet, for the bull to be rendered helpless and impotent, so far as resistance went—that he felt he must turn to avoid the terrible gaze of the tyrant bent upon his distruction, and that he must pursue the course which was indicated to him, in order to avoid that gaze which he could not bear to encounter.

Once and only once during that long and, to him, most painful drive, did the poor animal make what might be called a determined effort to resist the tyrannical oppressor. He had been ascending an inclined plane of about a mile in length, and at the top of it there was a sheet of water—one of those inland lakes so frequently found in South Africa, in which are almost as often found the alligator, and, where trees are abundant on the margins of the water, the rhinoceros. It is remarkable that cattle have a sort of instinctive dread of these waters—probably from their being the haunts of the former voracious reptiles—and they will endure great thirst rather than approach them. They seem to have been taught by experience—the most expressive of all teachers—that, although the eye may fail to detect the presence of the lurking monsters, they may be crouched under any bank, and if their hiding place be at one extremity of the lake and the prey at the other, they will run under the water and suddenly seize and drag down a victim before their presence is discovered. On ordinary occasions, no doubt, the bull would have shunned the water before him, but now he, perhaps, felt that no worse enemy could be in it than was behind him. At all events, when the lion bore away to the right to make the animal turn to the left, which was the direct course toward his own den, the bull plunged into the lake with a force that dashed the water into a foam, and proceeded directly across it. I expected the lion would follow; but his tactics were different.

To my surprise, he did not seem much put out of his way by the effort of his captive to escape. I was rejoicing, for I fancied the bull would get off. By "Jove," said I, "he will get away, and I am glad of it."

"He will, by-and-by," said Glenlyon, "but not now. That lion is too well up to his work. See how he bounds round the lake; by the time the bull is across he will head him, and his eyes will draw him out of the water as they drew him out of the herd."

And it was so. The crafty brute went round the bank by a series of bounds till he was opposite the panting creature, when the latter halted and turned to another point, where he hoped to land. In vain—the lion headed him there. After many efforts of a similar nature, all equally unavailing, their eyes must have met, for the bull became suddenly motionless—and then we heard the heavy stroke of the lion's paw upon the earth. It was repeated twice, and the poor bull unresistingly walked ashore, the lion drawing back to induce him to land, and then going on one side, as he had done on the former occasion. Then he got in the rear of his prey and drove him onward as quietly as before.

I could have rushed forward round the head of the lake and shot the brute, at all hazards to myself, so much were my sympathies with the helpless victim; and I should, had not Glenlyon placed his hand on my arm, saying:

"Do not be premature. The journey is drawing to a close. If the lion were killed here, we might have more difficulty with the lioness; we might not be able to draw her out, and we have no torches to go in to her; besides, there are but two things which can be well done in haste, and lion-killing is not one of them. When you catch fleas or run away from the cholera, you must use haste; but a hasty aim at a lion so crafty as that fellow is, would end far worse for you than him. So be quiet, and take things coolly. When he gets his prey to his own door, and his wife comes out to see what he has brought home, I shall perceive the right moment to begin, and you may be sure I will not neglect it. If I miss, then you may do your very best to correct my error; but remember once for all, a lion at close quarters is a dangerous beast to encounter, and no man is fit to meet him whose pulse rises half a beat above the ordinary number. Count your pulse, and tell me how fast it is going now."

I felt the indirect reproof. My heart was bumping audibly. With the best grace I could, I replied: "You are quite right, Glenlyon; I am not so cool as a man should be with an enemy like that. I shall never make a hunter."

After the attempt I have described, the poor bull made no other; he seemed to resign himself to his fate, whatever and however dreadful that might be, and, in truth, to his instincts it must have been a fearful one.

About three quarters of an hour from the time we left the lake the high rocks loomed darkly in our sight. No longer resisting, but hopeless and desponding, the bull hung his head droopingly, and moved on listlessly, he cared not whither, in whatever direction his grim follower intimated. Arrived at the foot of the boulders, the lion gave a roar that almost shook the rocks themselves, and the hapless victim sank forward on his knees, from which he with difficulty arose, and stood quivering with terror. He had scarcely risen when the lioness rushed out to the opening at the head of the boulders, in haste to view the spoil to be laid at her feet. The sight of another enemy in front of him caused the bull to shrink backwards, but a roar from the foe behind him caused him to stand, or rather to totter, while the vapor rose from his body profusely, and he uttered moans so despairing, so acutely expressive of his agonies, that I could scarcely bear to hear them, I felt my eyes growing moist, I own, when I found the hand of Glenlyon upon my left shoulder, and heard him whisper:

"Look to your caps; tell Ilitchj to do the same. You and he are too excited to aim truly, but I may want your roer and his rifle. Have both your knives out ready, if I should break my own. I shall abridge the tortures of that poor beast. The moment I get the two lions' heads in line, I fire. All I ask you to do is to hand me your roer then, and to load mine; plenty of powder and one bolt, as you saw me put in mine—a charge and half of powder. Now, God bless you! Here goes?"

He left me and walked up behind the lion till he could see the glare of the lioness' eyes between his ear-tips, when he knelt. She had not yet left the spot where she first stopped to look on the prey. Up went the roer slowly—bang! I could hear no crash; if there were any, it too closely followed the heavy report of the roer to be distinguished; but I knelt down to look beneath the smoke: the lion was on his knees, quivering.

The Kaffir had picked up part of a phrase in common use among our men: "His goose is cooked," and he now said to me, "Gooce cook—moosch big prophet—iz—cook gooce moosch well."

As he spoke, another "bang" was heard, and I saw the lioness leap and fall down among the boulders, where she rolled and struggled violently—now up, then down—on her side, fighting at the huge stones which she sent rolling against others—on her back, all her feet fighting with the air, and sending forth frightful yells that drew many eagles out of the rocks—in the hope of a banquet, probably—and their screams, joined to her unearthly shrieks, and the shrill cries of the vultures, made a deafening confusion of sounds in which our voices could not be heard.

I sprang forward to hand my roer to Glenlyon, who took it quite coolly, and drawing his tomahaac, went on to the lion, merely saying, "His appetite is spoiled, and his lady is very ill, I think." Using my night-glass, I could see the lion laid still till Glenlyon got up to him, when he moved, but as rapid as the lightning, the tomahaac swung round and was buried in his brains. Then he went on to the bull, and considerately turned his head round toward me. The animal caught sight of his dead foe, and seemed to comprehend that he was powerless to harm him, for he walked, or, more properly, reeled past him, and came on toward me, from whom, but a few hours before, he would have fled; and when at my side, he stood, panting, and with heaving flanks, between me and Ilitchj, each stroke of his heart being loudly heard, and large tears rolling down his face.

Anxious for Glenlyon, I hastily patted our new friend, as he stood trembling, and turned to go to see what the lioness was about. I might have spared myself the anxiety. Glenlyon had settled her earthly accounts for her, and was coolly walking back to me, and wiping his hunting-knife with some grass he had torn up. His first words when he came up were:

"Ilitchj, take that poor beast into the place where the coh is, and let him drink; the fever of terror must be quenched, or he will sink down, and we shall have difficulty in raising him. He has suffered enough for one night. Take in a light, and that branch of the ash you brought with you, for fear of snakes."

Then he turned to me saying:

"I think I have been very economical in the matter of powder to-night. I happened to make impressions in the right places for once."

A result of this night's work was, that a young man who was undergoing punishment upon the charge of stealing a cow, supported by merely circumstantial evidence, was set free. He had ever asserted his innocence, but there was no proof that a lion had slaughtered an animal on the spot, and no one supposed a lion capable of being his own "drover;" although imprints of a lion's feet were plainly seen. The facts here narrated created a doubt, of which the prisoner had the benefit; he was "pardoned," never having committed the crime, in truth!

I may add, that in this, as in all cases, extreme terror had effectually tamed the wild bull. He followed us back to the camp like a dog, seeming to fear every bush was a lion.

[CONCLUSION OF "THE PLAINTIFF NONSUITED."]

tion, and endeavoring to impress upon her the necessity I felt of maintaining my professional honor stainless, and above suspicion even. This came back indorsed, 'Riley versus Wolfe. The plaintiff nonsuited.'

"'The visible tracks of my respected would-be father in law,' I said, examining the note closely forother writing, but there was nothing else to be found.

"I admired spirit, when it was spirit, instead of impertinence, selfishness, or some other small sin; but I certainly did not admire Wakefield, and he was now Fanny's suitor. If I could not gain her for myself, I felt bound to save her from him, and went to work for that purpose.

"The chief obstacle to all my plans was the old gentleman, who seemed to be hastening matters to a crisis. I heard that Fanny was soon to become Mrs. Wakefield.

"I had kept up a correspondence with Benway in the Phillips and Lockshaw matter, and had learned from his last letter that Wells & Co. owned a branch store up the country farther, which was filled with goods, and they were doing finely.

"I immediately sent a legal acquaintance to Mr. Wolfe, with instructions to offer him a thousand dollars for the Well's claim, which was gladly accepted, for the Phillips and Lockshaw suit had been compromised for ten thousand dollars, and it was supposed that Wells & Co. could not pay one per cent. to any other claimant.

"I forwarded the notes to Benway, with instructions to attach the new store of goods, if possible, and then compromise for twelve thousand dollars—intending to lower the demand to six thousand, if necessary.

"In reply, I received a letter from Benway, telling me if I would take ten thousand dollars down, he would send me a draft for that. In two weeks the draft came for ten thousand dollars, less exchange, and I enclosed it to Mr. Wolfe, duly indorsed over to him by me, with my compliments.

"He came to my office, but I was out; he went to my hotel, and I was out; but he found me on the street.

"I bowed to him coldly and was passing on, for I knew my man, but he grasped my hand, and said; 'My dear Riley I beg your pardon. I have not done you justice. But the fact is, that Wisconsin loss almost ruined me. It would have ruined me, I believe, if this draft had not come just as it did. It's your money, Riley, and I would not take it under any other circumstances, or now, even, only on condition that I may pay it back when I get my matters straightened up, and collections made.'

"'I'm glad to hear, sir, that it has helped you so much,' said I. 'The money is yours, of course. Good morning, sir,' and I attempted to pass on.

"'But I cannot permit this, Riley,' said, he impulsively; 'you must come over to dinner.'

"I made some lame excuse, but he insisted.

"'We shall all expect you,' he said, 'for to tell the truth, Riley, we have been gloomy enough of late—Fanny particularly. My financial difficulties depressed the whole household. Come to dinner to-morrow.'

"I nodded, having suddenly become a little too much choked up to talk much, and walked away.

"I went there at the appointed time, of course, for Wolfe always had one acceptable thing at his table, and that was good-humor. He was princely at his repasts. At first we felt formal, but it wouldn't do; we broke down, and presently found our old selves again. She is engaged to Wakefield, and I was too much of a gentleman to be otherwise than jolly over it—so very merry, indeed, that she didn't seem to like it.

"She had expected sentimental sighs, sheep's eyes, allusions to old times, and such things. But the old gentleman poured forth a deluge of fun, and I joined him in increasing the good feeling. I have since been confidentially informed that I was never so brilliant in my life—in fact, perfectly fascinating! I went there regularly to dinner, and often met Wakefield, whose day of destiny was drawing near. They were to be married in a month—that was fixed. I learned afterwards that it had been adjourned over a short time, and I couldn't find out the reason. So I went up to Mr. Wolfe's house and settled Mr. C. Wakefield at one blow.

"Gentlemen, I couldn't help it. There is a statue against cruelty to animals, and he was suffering.

"It is a peculiarity of mine, perhaps, that, when a case is decided against me, I bear no ill-will: and when it is for me, I always pity my opponent, Therefore it was, that, 'as a man and a brother' lawyer I felt sorry for poor Wakefield when Fanny entered on her docket, 'Wakefield versus Wolfe. The plaintiff nonsuited.'

"But my grief was transient, for in that case, as in all cases against her, I was then, and still remain, the defendant's attorney, in fact and in law."—Atlantic Monthly.

MAYER'S BAZAAR.—R. Mayer offers at his Bazaar, corner Pine and Montgomery streets, the greatest variety of jewelry, watches, silver plated ware, guitars, music boxes; concertinas, accordeons, opera glasses, etc., etc., to the public of San Francisco, and to the country trade, at prices that defy competition, and is determined to close out his present stock at greatly reduced rates. His heavy case silver watches from the American Watch Company are superior to anything ever before offered to the public. These watches are taking the place of heavy gold watches from the fact that the workmanship is superior, the casings pure silver, and the prices low. The sale of these watches is very extensive on the Pacific coast. Another proof that American manufactures can beat the world. The works are made of platina and never get out of repair. French opera glasses of great power for sale or hire, and all kinds of musical instruments, eight day family clocks, etc. This is a rare chance to invest your money to advantage, at Mayer's Bazaar, southeast corner of Montgomery and Pine streets.

N. B.—An immense assortment of Japanese curiosities for sale.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

THE LOVE OF GOLD.

A STORY OF CRIME, BUT NOT OF THE DARKEST DYE.

CHAPTER I.—THE EVIL COUNSELOR.

It was in an evil moment that she listened to his suggestions. But, alas, she was scarcely mistress of her actions when his evil counsels prevailed.

She sat alone in her quiet boudoir. Her hands were clasped in agony as she rocked to and fro, murmuring to herself. What is it that she whispers?

"Gold—gold! O yes, it must be gold!"

The next day she left her home—but not forever! No, only for an hour or so.

CHAPTER II.—A PICTURE OF HOME.

They had been very—very happy, she and her Algernon, the husband of her choice. Three darling children had blest their union, and they had a villa at Bayswater.

Every night when he returned from the Money Market, where had a stall and drove a brisk trade, he drew her toward him, and she leaned on his shoulder until her raven tresses mingled with the tawny beard that flowed over his manly bosom and the intervening white waistcoat.

But that might never—never be again!

CHAPTER III.—A SAD CHANGE.

She flew homeward with a guilty conscience! She scarce dared to meet the gaze of the domestic who opened the door. That domestic started, uttering a smothered "O, my!" But she heeded not. She flew up sairs to the nursery, and clasped her children to her palpitating bosom.

The little creatures struggle to get away from her. The baby went into convulsions. They did not recognize her as their mother. Wringing her hands wildly, she fled down stairs. Algernon had just returned. She met him in the passage—trembling, half fainting. He looked at her coldly and passed her by.

She tumbled down flat on the door mat!

And why was this?

Why? Because her evil counselor, the hairdresser, had prevailed on her to have her hair bleached to the fashionable yellow, to be sure; and, of course, it did not become her.

At a Sabbath school "concert," held in one of the prettiest towns in Western New York, a portion of the exercises consisted in each scholar repeating a verse of Scripture, in which should be found the word love. When it came to the turn of Miss J——, a beautiful lady of eighteen, and "in the market," she was unprepared with the answer; but before the exercises were concluded, she remarked to her teacher that she had found the verse. It was: "I love those who love me, and those who seek me early shall find me." Excellent girl that!

A Sad Case for the Underwriters.—A wreck of a woman with a cataract in her eye, a waterfall on the back of her head, a creek in her back, forty springs in her hooped skirt, and high-tied shoes on.

Hearts, the best card in the chance game of matrimony; sometimes overcome by diamonds and knaves; often won by tricks; and occasionally treated in a shuffling manner, and then cut altogether.

The difference between Whittier's new poem and a Massachusetts' schoolmarm is, that while one is "The Tent on the Beach," the other is bent on the teach.

Millinery and Head-Dresses.—Mrs Winship has just received, per last steamer, the latest Parisian Millinery Goods and Laces for HEAD-DRESS, consisting in part of Breakfast Caps, Point Application, Lace Vallenciennes, and the Widow's Rooche, worn by the crown heads of Europe, and the only first imported to the Pacific Coast. Queen Emma, while here, replenished her wardrobe from the stock then and now on hand, at MRS WINSHIP, No. 23 Post Street, under the Mechanics' Institute. Through the influence of Queen Emma, Mrs Winship has filled quite a number of orders for the foreign population of Honolulu. The ladies of San Francisco should call and examine these beautiful Goods, by which means they will secure the Latest Fashionable Styles.

What's the Matter?—In passing through Third street yesterday, we saw crowds of people entering a building a few doors below Market street, and we inquired of a passer-by what's the matter? He answered that they were going to have their pictures taken in the NEW YORK PHOTOGRAPHIC GALLERY, and the cause of the rush was that this took the best and cheapest pictures in the city; the inducement must be much to draw so big a crowd from Montgomery and the other streets in the northern part of the city.

EACH HEART HAS ITS SOMEBODY.

Oh, Alice! what are you doing,
Sitting alone in your room?
The others down stairs are dancing;
You must not stay in the gloom.
What is the matter, my darling?
Your voice is husky with tears;
And your cheek was wet when I kissed it—
There—whisper—nobody hears.

No answer—must I conjecture?
Is some one you love to blame?
Has somebody cross'd or vex'd you?
Hush, dearest, I use no name!
There's no need to flush so crimson,
For what have I said or done?
Isn't somebody some one's darling?
Each heart has its Number One!

Perhaps you will scarce believe it,
But, a long, long time ago,
I'd a face that was not uncomely,
And I'd friends who told me so.
This wrinkled skin then was polish'd,
These dim eyes were clear and bright,
My hair had a shade as golden
As yours when you face the light.

Listen! I'll tell you what happen'd—
The same happens ev'ry day;
Somebody told me he loved me,
And I gave my heart away!
We parted—he named a twelvemonth;
He vow'd to be true and trust.
Ah, well!—I will put it briefly—
His vows were written in dust!

We parted—and worse than distance
Was the world that crept between;
The glowing lights of the present,
Which deadened what once had been.
He forgot me when I was absent,
He went after something new—
Alice, don't look so indignant,
'Tis what hundreds of people do!

Come, if you misdoubt my meaning,
I'll tell you what chanced to-night.
Did you see that old man down stairs,
Whose hair was so thin and white?
If I remember properly,
You stood in the corridor
When, in the throng of careless guests,
He came through the entrance-door.

Do you remember our meeting;
Our hands how quietly clasped;
The long, calm gaze in each other's eyes;
And the silence that elapsed,
Before our hearts recovered speech?
Well, people would never have thought
That he had once been my somebody;
Even you discovered nought.

Yes, it is just as I tell you—
After many bitter years
We met, with no show of feeling,
No sighings, reproaches, tears.
We met but as mere acquaintance,
With greetings constrained and cold;
Only a glance of wonder
That each should have grown so old.

He spoke—but his very accents
Were changed from their former tone,
That querulous voice was never
The voice of my love—my own;
'Twas the voice of the gouty husband
Of her in maroon and lace,
Who sat by Sir John at dinner,
And grew so red in the face.

So, Alice, don't sit here moping
And sighing for some one's sake;
When the world is made up of changes
There's no fear your heart will break;
For even the loved and injured
Get over the pain at last,
Grow wiser, calmer and better
For lessons learned in the past.

An insurance agent, urging a citizen to get his life insured, said: "Get your life insured for ten thousand dollars, and then if you die next week, the widder's heart will sing for joy."

REPENTANCE.

I.

A kitten once to its mother said:
"I'll never more be good;
But I ll go and be a robber fierce,
And live in a dreary wood,
Wood, wood, wood,
And live in a dreary wood."

II.

It climbed a tree to rob a nest
Of young and tender owls;
But the branch broke off and the kitten fell,
With six tremendous howls!
Howls, howls, howls,
With six tremendous howls!

III.

Then up it rose, and scratched its nose,
And went home very sad:
"Oh! mother dear, behold me here,
I'll never more be bad,
Bad, bad, bad,
I'll never more be bad."

PREJUDICE AND CHARITY.—It is safe to say that by far the greater number of our antipathies are founded on unjust prejudice. Give them the opportunity of free explanation without fear of rebuff or coldness, and the men you dislike most will show you that you ought to like them. If you doubt this, ask yourself whether you do not feel that you could effect a similar change, with occasion, in the sentiments of those who dislike yourself. The answer with the right thinking and generous can scarcely be equivocal. We are too much in the habit of forgetting, what is nevertheless strictly true, that we owe a certain duty—a duty of kindness, of fraternal regard, of mutual encouragement, in this dusty road of life to every living soul we encounter in it. There is little of the spirit of Christianity in a heart which, its attention directed to this truth, can turn coldly away from it. The turmoil and hurry of life, and especially of business life, is unfavorable to the candid survey of apparent minutiæ like those of commonplace antipathies, and the fact should make us persistent and energetic in considering and correcting them. For nearly all of us there are cordial, trusty friends to be gained by no greater effort than that which will summon the magnanimity to suppress or conquer frivolous and unmanly antipathies. We think that those reflections are even better applicable to women than to men. The greater part of the feuds and aversions, the scandals and petty hatreds of society, are attributable to such ignoble sources as those we have discussed. Dislike founded upon incidents which most people are ashamed to mention, is a hundred times more common than that which is due to incidents which are acknowledged and palpable. The whole subject, discuss it as we may, brings us unfailingly to appreciate the great need—the unchristian deficiency—of our modern society, which is simply and in a word the diffusion and practice of charity.—Round Table.

"MAY I be married, ma," asked a pretty young miss of sixteen. "What do you want to get married for?" inquired her mother. "Why, ma, you know the children have never seen any one married, and I thought it might please them a little, that's all" "Nonsense, you can't fool me," remarked the old lady with a significant shake of the head.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla
TO
Purify the Blood.

NOT A FEW OF THE WORST DISORDERS THAT afflict mankind arise from the corruption that accumulates in the blood. Of all the discoveries that have been made to purge it out, none have been found which could equal in effect AYER'S COMPOUND EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. It cleanses and renovates the blood, instills the vigor of health into the system and purges out the humors which make disease. It stimulates the healthy functions of the body, and expels the disorders that grow and rankle in the blood. Its extraordinary virtues are not yet widely known, but, when they are, it will no longer be a question what remedy to employ in the great variety of afflicting diseases that require an alterative remedy. Such a remedy, that could be relied on, has long been sought for, and now, for the first time, the public have one on which they can depend. Our space here does not admit certificates to show its effects But the trial of a single bottle will show to the sick that it has virtues surpassing anything they have ever taken. Sufferers from Scrofula, Scrofulous Swellings and Sores, try it and see the rapidity with which it cures. Skin Diseases, Pimples, Pustules, Blotches, Eruptions, etc., are soon cleaned out of the system.

St. Anthony's Fire, Rose or Erysipelas, Tetter or Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Ringworm, etc., should not be borne while they can be so speedily cured by AYER'S SARSAPARILLA.

Syphilis or Venereal Disease is expelled from the system by the prolonged use of this SARSAPARILLA, and the patient is left as healthy as if he never had the disease.

Female Diseases are caused by Scrofula in the blood, and are generally soon cured by this EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. Price $1 per bottle, or 6 bottles for $5.

For all the purposes of a family physic, take AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS, which are everywhere known to be the best purgative that is offered to the American People.

Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, MASS., and sold by all Druggists and dealers in medicine everywhere.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

EDWARD J. QUIRK, Plaintiff, vs. JAMES P. HORBACH, et als., Defendants

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the said city and county of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES P. HORBACH, HENRY DELVENDAHL, HENRY BREMMERMAN, ERNST JANSSEN and GUSTAV HELMKE, Defendants:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this District, within twenty days otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to require you, the said defendants, to set forth the nature of your respective claims to that certain lot or parcel of land situate in said city and county of San Francisco, as particularly described in the complaint herein, being subdivision No. 5 of the 100 vara lot known on the map of the city of San Francisco as No. 276, as designated on a plat of the original subdivision thereof, recorded in the office of the County Recorder of said city and County, in Liber 1 of Certified Grants, at page 156, that all adverse claims of said defendants and each of them may be determined by a decree of this Court; that by said decree it be declared and adjudged that the said defendants, each and all of them, have no estate or interest whatever in or to said parcel of land, and that the title of plaintiff thereto is good and valid; that said defendants, and each of them, be forever debarred from asserting any claim whatever in and to said land adverse to plaintiff, and for such other and further relief as to this Hon. Court shall seem meet and agreeable to equity, with costs of suit against such of the defendants as shall defend this action.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, this 25th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FOURTH Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

SIEGMUND T. MEYER and ASHER T. MEYER, Plaintiffs, vs. LINA A. SON, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Fourth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to LINA A. SON, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fourth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, (a copy of which accompanies this summons) within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to recover the sum of two thousand nine hundred and ninety-one and 85-100 dollars, alleged to be due from you to the plaintiffs on a judgment recovered by said plaintiffs against you, and more particularly described in the complaint herein, together with costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified, that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said Plaintiffs will take judgment against you for said sum and costs of suit.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Fourth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this nineteenth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven

MIKADO JAPANESE TROUPE,

17 MALE AND FEMALE ARTISTS,

Under the management of J. R. MARSHALL, will appear on MONDAY EVENING.....JUNE 3d,

For a few evenings, previous to the departure of the P. M. Steamship, in a series of NOVEL, BRILLIANT, HUMEROUS and SENSATIONAL FEATS, peculiarly Japanese, such as Slack Rope Performances, Tub Balancing, Walking a Ladder of Swords, Top Spinning, Conjuring, Perche, Paper Ladder Act, Bending, Magic Screen and Ladder, and Performing Birds.

The feats of Balancing, with the Tubs, Ladders, Bamboos, Screens, and Boat by the Artist YOSHIGREROO, the Yeddo Hercules, assisted by his Family of Males and Females, are astonishing and picturesque.

TOROONOSKI, the Blondin of Japan, among other feats, will construct a Ladder of Paper, in presence of the audience, ascend it, and execute a most thrilling performance, walk with Clogs on a Swinging Bamboo, twenty feet long, suspended in the air, ascend a Slack Rope from the floor of the stage to the gallery, making his descent in a most daring and artistic style.

TZENAGEEROO performs the most incredible feat of walking a Ladder of Swords, edge uppermost, barefooted.

The remainder of the Troupe will be found equally interesting, and capable in their different acts, too numerous to mention.

They are acknowledged to be the most efficient and accomplished Troupe of the kind in Japan, and will make every endeavor to win the good opinion of the people of America during their few months sojourn.

The San Francisco Wind.

The wind has received much attention from poets, sailors and millers. Modified and mitigated winds are termed breezes and zephyrs. They are very pleasant, save when laden as they are at times with perfumery overdone. The most villainous in the world is the San Francisco wind. Very angry, and irritable is this species of wind. It always gets up about noon in a dreadful stute of temper. It tackles everything, like a young housekeeper who has so much to do that she knows not what to take hold of first. So she goes rampaging and charging around, sweeping a bit here, and dusting a bit there, and rushing out into the kitchen to see the coffee boil over, and rushing back to answer some vexatious match-peddler's knock at the front door, scolding everyone who comes in her way. Something in this manner does the San Francisco wind handle men and women, being no respector of persons. It chucks great armfuls of dust in your eyes, and then it follows up the dust attack with clouds of sand. I have seen it bundle a respectable woman on the corner of Market and Third, where it descends from above perpendicularly and blows seven different ways at once. I have seen it bandie such a woman as if it considered that woman a carpet which needed shaking. I looked to see that woman go up heavenward, but she did not because she had set her head against going in that direction just then, and when a woman sets her head against anything it is hard even for a San Francisco wind to oppose her.

The San Francisco wind takes a malicious pleasure in blowing your hat off, if it be a new one, and then rolling it tantalizingly ahead of you in the dirtiest places it can select. It manifests great judgment in picking out dirty places.

The San Francisco wind is responsible for a vast amount of bad temper. On the few calm days with which we are favored during the windy season, people who have to walk home arrive there in a terrible humor, but the rest of the time they are so beat and banged about by the airy tempest as to work them into such an intensified state of nervous irritability that the afflicted persons are fit to commit murder or any other crime for which they have a liking, immediately on crossing the family threshold.

The San Francisco wind is the meanest wind a poor man can breathe or exist in, not so much on account of his lungs, as his clothes when they are of black broadcloth and he is unable to buy more than one suit a year. It rains down seediness on impoverished humanity.

Letters from the People.

The Call has of late very properly devoted a portion of its space to "letters from the people." The people avail themselves of this opportunity to rush into print. "Pater Familias" informs the Call and the public generally that his wife bought some salmon of a fish-peddler, paid for two pounds, and on weighing it found she had only received twenty-two ounces. We know that "Pater Familias;" he's a regular tradesman who keeps a store—perhaps he is a fish-monger—and he is continually writing to the Call under various names, and warning people against patronizing peddlers. Then "Pamela Brown" complains bitterly that a nail in the sidewalk tore her dress. She says:

"I am a poor, hard-working girl, away from my parents, who reside a long way from here, and, owing to the objection above alluded to, have been a sufferer; for, on going to the Post Office to inquire for letters, last week, and the boards of the footway being so very loose, sprung up and a projected nail, or a portion of the board, catching my dress, tore it to such an extent as to cause me considerable time and expense to repair, which I can ill afford. Please call the attention of the authorities to this nuisance, and oblige your very humble servant."

Now we must say that the Call was very good natured to oblige poor Pamela Brown, a hard-working girl, away from her parents, who reside a long way from here, by allowing her to tell the public how she tore her dress. It was a little rough on Pamela, we own, as had her parents not been a long way from here, she might have got her mother to mend her dress for her instead of sewing up the rent herself. However, if "the authorities" have hammered down that projected nail in consequence of Pamela Brown's letter to the Call, then, indeed, has that paper been of public service. We always considered the Call a useful little paper.

Seriously Concerned.

The Spirit of the Times and Fireman's Journal has broken out in a fresh spot. Directly below a sporting item, containing the valuable information that a gentleman of Los Angeles "claims the name of Col. Lathrop for n ch. colt foaled March 16, 1867, one white hind-foot and small white spot in the face, sired by Fireman, dam old Lena, by Grey Eagle out of a Picket mare." Just below this bit of sporting intelligence, is an "article" concerning the issue in the Episcopal Church of this diocese, between the friends of the Rev. Mr. Eagan on the one hand, and the Bishop and the regularly constituted church authorities on the other. As the question is a very serious and complicated one, involving points of ecclesiastical law and usage in said Episcopal Church, besides sundry disputed matters of fact, the deliberate opinion of the editor of the Fireman's Journal and Spirit of the Times, as a gentleman thoroughly posted in "fistiana," the "turf," dog-fights, and the capacity of thorough-bred rat-and-tan terriers for dispatching a given number of rats in a given number of minutes, must be of inestimable value to the religious world—scarcely less so indeed, than the theological views of the learned editors of the flash Sunday papers Little sins against the canons of grammar and rhetoric, are to be looked for in Sporting organs, and seem to be rather appropriate to them than otherwise; therefore the weight of the Spirit's verdict ought not to be estimated by the quality of the language in which it is expressed. Here it is:

"We look upon this whole affair, from its inception to its close, as most disgraceful to the Church and productive of no good whatever. * * * To be so near the Almighty as the Bishop of the Church is supposed to be, he is farther removed from the people, for whom the Son of God died to save, than any Prelate of the Episcopal Church we ever heard of.

This is very severe on Bishop Kip, and we are sincerely sorry for him. He is remorselessly set down as the worst prelate with whom the editor of the Fireman's Journal ever had any intimate, personal acquaintance, and as the number of said prelates must be presumed to be very large, the case of our Bishop is truly deplorable.

The Primary Election.

We strolled around last Wednesday to look at the first legalized primary elections held in this city. People interested in saving the country, say that legalized primaries are a good thing. To us it seems a still further complication of the elective machinery, necessitating, perhaps, in a few years the establishment and legalization of ante-primary elections to elect somebody or something to the primaries. Politics is certainly getting to be a very difficult and complicated study. To be a good citizen, and a properly developed voter, you must get registered, you must attend all the preparatory meetings, you must read various political newspapers, you must keep on good terms with two or three professional politicians to keep posted, and you must be able, when duty calls, to drink bad whisky. It is a hard and laborious occupation. Many of the men we saw on Wednesday, about those primaries, looked as if their patriotic calling had told heavily upon their constitutions. The concentration of the mingled odor of tobacco, whisky, Democrats and Republicans at the polling places was immense. Thank Heaven there are so many willing to relieve us of our share of the burthen of saving the country and holding office.

Sound and Sense.

The lady who advertises in the following manner in a daily paper should have availed herself of the services of some one who knew how to write English:

"WANTED—Every father and mother in San Francisco wishing their sons or daughters to play music well, read well, sing well and articulate song words distinctly, feelingly and beautifully, are requested to call and see Mrs. S. J. C., who will play, sing and read for you with pleasure."

If Mrs. S. J. C. teaches her pupils to mangle words as she mangles the English language, she is a dangerous woman and should be avoided. If Mrs. S. J. C. is as little skilled in the grammar of music as she is in the grammar of the English language, then every father and mother who are requested to call on her will hear her play and sing for you with anything but pleasure. Why does not some one establish a bureau and write advertisements of all kinds in decent English for a moderate compensation?

The Power of Music.

Some one says that music hath power to move the savage breast and make the wildest Indian tame. The Indians are at present very savage. Would it not be well to try the power of music on them, attack them with music produced from barrel organs instead of lead from rifle barrels. The power of music on the brute creation has been fully tested. An exchange, in speaking of the magical strains of a hand organ, says: "When he played Old Dog Tray, we noticed 11 pups sitting in front of the machine on their haunches, brushing away the tears from their eyes with their fore paws." If 11 pups were thus subjected by the strains of one hand-organ, what would be the effect of a thousand hand-organs on the Indians? The inhabitants of the chief cities of the United States would gladly spare them for a month or two.

Freight from Australia.

A Mr. Jobson who recently arrived from Australia, has brought with him a poem addressed to Washington, which he has submitted to the Board of Supervisors for their approval. It is not yet decided whether or not Mr. Shrader will read it on the coming Fourth of July.

Unspeakably Delightful.

A Washington correspondent of the Boston Transcript, tells a story about an Indiana soldier who was buried alive for two days and a half. Five coffins were piled on his coffin, and when he woke to consciousness on the third day, we are told that "his first feeling was a suffocating sensation." It is probable if he awoke that he did feel rather suffocated. Then we are told he screamed, and the sentinel guarding the tomb dropped his musket which went off. We give the remainder of the story in the correspondent's own words:

"The report aroused Mr. M. still more to a sense of his condition and awful location. He redoubled his screams, bringing a rush of soldiers to the tomb, who soon got him out and relieved him from his terrible confinement. He says that, though never conscious of his dreadful situation, his mind was always active, and his sensations unspeakably delightful—seeming to float through scenes of surpassing beauty, amid strains of delicious music, such, to use his own words, as he has never heard since."

Now mark how easily this infamous correspondent is proved to be a story teller. Mr. M. was "aroused to a sense of his condition and awful 'location,'" we are told. Then "he redoubled his screams." After this, we are informed that he was "never conscious of his dreadful situation." If he was aroused to a sense of his "awful location" how is it that he was never conscious of his "awful situation!" As to his hearing strains of delicious music which he has never heard since, this is easily explained, if he has not been to the opera since his recovery. We cannot believe that his sensations were unspeakably delightful when he had five coffins on the top of his own peculiar coffin. If they were why did he scream, and why did he redouble his screams? This is just the sort of thing to encourage people to get themselves buried alive, and have five coffins piled on the top of them. We beg everyone to place no credence in this wicked prevaricator's story.

Conscience.

The California Farmer of Thursday, May 30th, publishes "Conscience," by James Linen, with the following introduction:

"[We are most happy to give our readers the following Gem of Poetry, from our gifted California Poet, James Linen, Esq. We know our readers will justly appreciate it, and acknowledge it to be truly a Gem in Poetry.]"

"Conscience" in the Farmer of the above date, only amounts to about three quarters of a foot. Had the Farmer a little more conscience it would have duly credited the "poem" to THE CALIFORNIAN, for which paper it was originally written, instead of simply introducing it to its lucolic readers as "a Gem in Poetry," and expressing its firm conviction that its readers would justly appreciate it and acknowledge it to be truly "a Gem in Poetry." Gemmy Linen's Gem in Poetry will, we trust, be fully appreciated; but still, the editor of the Farmer ought not to have published it without credit. The poem commences:

"Tell me, O Conscience! what thou art,
That fires the brain and wrings the heart;
That haunts the guilty mind with fears,
And fills the bitter mind with tears."

Ah, ah! If the Farmer man has any conscience, his poor brain is pretty hot, his unfortunate heart is being wrung like a flannel petticoat in Maxton's patent clothes wringer, his guilty mind is pretty well haunted with fears, and the aforesaid mind is just pickled in bitter tears.

Police and Religion.

We are informed by the Eastern press that a young Methodist clergyman has preached from the steps of his church in Salisbury, N. H., all through the winter, the house having been closed against him soon after he was sent there. No one comes to hear him, but in storm or shine, he takes his position with uncovered head, and exhorts and prays, and no expostulation or entreaty can turn him from what he deems his duty. We do not exactly understand why this young Methodist clergyman should be considered an object of sympathy by the press. The unfortunate Mr. Crisis, who preached in this city with uncovered head, was first villified by the unscrupulous Fitz Smythe in the public prints, and afterwards arrested by the police. If that young Methodist clergyman were to preach anywhere within a block of the Alta office, in this city, he would not be expostulated with or entreated to desist; he would be lugged off to the calaboose, unless the policeman on the beat and Fitz Smythe and the majority of those who were passing by happened to be Methodists. We have a free church in San Francisco, but we don't approve of religion being made too free. Business is business, and no peddling without a license is tolerated.

Our Mechanics.

Our bosom swelled with patriotic pride as we contemplated the grand turn out of the workingmen of this city on Monday. They didn't look much like the "down-trodden masses, of the effete monarchies of the Old World." Not a bit of it. They didn't look as if they suffered much from short-rations, and the display of Sunday dry-goods was most liberal. We don't believe that the people who do the brain work, and labor from twelve to sixteen hours a day could turn out in as good store clothes, with white gloves, etc., or that they could afford to pay for so many carriages and bands of music. We heaved a sigh as we contemplated these happy fellows, and groaned in spirit over the evil destiny that had consigned us to the doom of a "slave of the lamp," instead of making us a working man.

Literary Co-partnership.

The Times says that Alice Kingsbury intended to produce, before she left for Europe, several plays written for her by "a lady and gentleman of this city," and regretted not being able to do so. This is better than the Beaumont and Fletcher partnership. Ah! How much the public of San Francisco lost in not having introduced to it the literary offspring of a lady and gentleman of this city!

THE THREE PELLETS OF BREAD.

THE FIRST PELLET.

IN 1824, toward the end of October, ten yonng men were concluding a repast at one of the tables of the Café de Paris. The succulent dishes had been apparently well seasoned with wine, for all their faces were illuminated, and all were talking at the same time.

Nor was it surprising that the meeting had been a jovial one. The amphitryon—George Benier by name—only the other day sub-lieutenant in the 5th Regiment of Dragoons had unexpectedly inherited a fortune estimated at six hundred thonsand francs. Barely a month had elapsed since he had received, whilst serving in Spain, the news of the death of an uncle, who had left him heir to the accumulations of an industrious and well-spent life. He had obtained leave of absence, and had hurried off to the capital to realize his fortune. He had also invited what few friends—chiefly college chums— he had in Paris, to participate in his happiness. He had nine—in a day or two he would have fifty. A man with a well-lined pocket has always plenty of friends.

The banquet held in honor of this sudden accession of funds was coming to a conclusion—that is to say, the party were at their last bottles of champagne. Awaiting coffee, everyone was laughing, talking, or gesticulating, without concerning himself about listening or being listened to. The host, who was more animated even than the others, probably because, in his quality of host, he had deemed it necessary to set a good example, was endeavoring to get a word in concerning his feats of valor in the Peninsula—expatiating upon the assault of the Trocadero on the 31st of August, 1823, and the delivery of Ferdinand VII. from the hands of the Cortes; but everyone was too happy to listen to details.

In the meantime, coffee had been brought in. The young man—George Benier was in his twenty-first year—was lifting his cup to his lips, when he suddenly put it down again, with an exclamation of surprise and disgust.

"Garcon!" he shouted, in a voice that made the whole establisement start, "take this cup away at once."

And, as he said this, he pointed to two flies that had been stupid enough to take a bath in the hot fluid—a bath which had cost them their lives. One of the gareons took away the cup, whilst another busied himself in repairing the disaster. The guests were laughing heartily at the discomfiture of the lieutenant of dragoons.

"Ah! ah!" said one, "George is afraid of a fly!"

But, Prosper Dyonnet, a college chum, interposed—"Don't you remember? he used to kill them by hundreds; his conscience troubles him, and now the sight of two dead flies awakeos his remorse."

The interpellation excited renewed laughter, in which George joined heartily.

"True, gentlemen," he said, "I always had a horror of flies, and I became so skillful by dint of practice in killing them with pellets of bread, that I got the surname of 'Tueur de mouches.' I have not lost my skill yet, I can tell yon; but if I assassinate flies, that is no reason why I should also swallow them."

"Well said," observed one of the guests; and with after-dinner thoughtlessness, and the love of fun natural to youth, he proposed that George should give them proof that he was still entitled to what he was pleased to designate as a glorious title to distinction.

To this effect a roll of bread was taken from a table close by. George Benier, as serious as if he were about to solve a problem in mathematics, broke it, took out the crumbs, and began to prepare his ammunition. Having made three pellets, he held them out in his open hand.

"Now," he said, "who'll bet that I don't kill a fly with each shot?"

"We'll all bet," shouted the guests. "What shall it be? A monster punch!"

"Good; but what distance do you allow me?"

"We leave that to you—a pellet of bread is not precisely a conical ball."

In the interval, a man, apparently above fifty years of age, with grey monstaches and coat buttoned up—evidently an old soldier—had come into the café. Ordering a cup of chocolate, he had taken up a newspaper, and was reading as he awaited his refreshment. The room was crowded with flies, half stupified by the approach of winter, and George Benier observed that three had settled upon the new comer—one on his arm, another on his neck, and a third had the impudence actually to alight on the very hand that held the paper. The guests watched the direction which George's eyes had taken, and the same malicious idea occurred at the same moment to all their excited brains. This idea was mutually exchanged by nods, and smiles, and intelligent glances, but not formulated into words. That would have spoilt the fun. George, encouraged by these looks of approbation, made his preparations for the commission of a grievous act of folly.

Placing one of the pellets on his thumb, and holding it there by the medium finger curved into a bow, so as to act as a spring, he took aim at the right hand of the man with the grey moustaches. It must be said to his credit, however that he hesitated for a moment, a ray of sense flashed across his mind, and he turned around to look at his friends. But all he saw there was encouragement by nods, and winks, and smiles, It was such fun! Alas! how many foolish things are done under the absurd impression that there is something funny in them!

George's thumb went off; the pellet was shot forth, and killed the fly that lay on the officer's hand.

"Superb!" ejaculated his friends, but in subdued tones, not to interfere with the progress of their rich friend's experiment.

As to the veteran, he never moved, but continued to read his paper as if nothing had happened. Encouraged by his success, and excited by the applause of his friends, as also by the attention of other spectators which had been attracted to what was going on, George Benier took aim at the shoulder, and the second fly fell a victim to his skill. After this there was no receding. The man in the buttoned-up coat persisted in ignoring the insults put upon his person; there was only one fly more to kill to inaugurate the monster punch, and that fly was stretching out its fore feet not many inches below the formidable grey moustaches. Off went the third pellet, and the intrusive insect fell dead. The experiment concluded, there was no longer any cause for silence, and all the guests united in shouting "Vive le Tueur de mouches!"

But whilst they were thus jubilant and triumphant, the man in the buttoned-up coat had slowly risen, and stooping, he deliberately picked up the three pellets of bread, which done, he walked over, quite calmly, to where George sat with his friends. The laughter now suddenly ceased, and the attention of the other spectators became breathless. Strangers, as well as the friends of the "Tueur de mouches," knew that matters could not stop there. A pin might have been heard to fall in the whole café.

The man with the grey moustaches saluted the company. The salutation was respectfully returned by George and his guests. George was a little pale, but calm. The veteran, extended his hand, in the palm of which were the three pellets of bread, was about to speak. But George, who would not allow, even for half a second, that it should be supposed that he would leave the responsibility on anyone but himself, anticipated him.

"It was I sir; I shot those pellets."

The unknown bowed again.

"That is sufficient, sir."

So saying, he quietly unbuttoned his coat, and drew forth a card from his waistcoat pocket.

"Monsieur," he said, "will be good enough to show me that he is as skillful with a sword as he is with a pellet of bread?"

"At your orders, sir," replied George, as he exchanged cards with his adversary.

Upon the stranger's card was graven: "Louis Rodet, ex-Captain of Light Infantry."

Next morning at ten the young soldier of the Trocadero and the veteran of Austerlitz and of Wagram met, accompanied each by two friends, in the Bois de Boulogne. George was a proficient in sword exercise, but by no means as much so as the captain. After a few passes he had to give up the combat, his right arm being pierced through and through. As the veteran left the field, he saluted his wounded and discomfited antagonist with great courtesy:

"Till we have the pleasure of meeting again, sir," he said.

"You are really too kind," retorted George Benier.

And following the old soldier with his eyes as he took his departure, accompanied by two veterans of his own stamp.

"Ah ca!" he muttered, "what does that animal mean with his 'pleasure of meeting me again?' Does he not think one lesson of politeness sufficient? The idea is any thing but reassuring!"

George Benier had to keep his bed for two months. His wound was severe, and he had to observe complete repose. After these two months, a third was enjoined in his room for convalescence.

"It was well worth while," he said to himself, "to hurry from Spain to claim my inheritance, and to have to spend three months in suffering and tedium!"

But at length he was free, and happy in being able to walk, eat, run, and laugh like everybody else. Prosper Dyonnet remained his boon companion, although he entertained a slight grudge toward him for his folly in resuscitating his talents as a collegian in so inopportune a manner. But he remembered also that Prosper had had a few glasses of champagne too many, and he forgave him. Prosper, besides, knew Paris intimately, and not only assisted him in procuring a carriage and horses, but also introduced him to the world.

THE SECOND PELLET.

During the carnival of 1825, George Benier made the acquaintance, at an opera ball, of a lady who was much sought after at that period, and who was known as the Baroness of Belmonte. We say known, for she was no more a baroness than her mother, who sold artichokes in winter and oranges in summer. Despite her humble origin, the baroness, however, was clever, and she managed to captivate the young man. He could not sleep at night, and spent the day in deploring to his Prosper Dyonnet the cruelty of the fair one. Not that the baroness objected to the young man's attentions, but she knew her interests too well to succumb at once. Three weeks had passed in walks and drives, the lady had accepted both cashmeres and diamonds, but as yet had given no signs of a riciprocal affection. George began to weary of laying siege to so impregnable a place. Scenes of recrimination occurred, till the lady, fearing she might lose her lover, showed more symptoms of relenting.

George was walking arm-in-arm with his friend Prosper on the Boulevards. He was in high spirits; visions of happiness were before him which he did not fail to confide to his bosom friend, and they agreed to celebrate the happy turn in events by a repast at the Café Anglais. They had just reached the threshold, and George was about to step in, when he was stopped by a hand placed on his shoulder, and a voice interposed:

"I beg your pardon, sir. A word, if you please."

George turned round in anger. The voice was well known to him—very unpleasantly so—and he and his friend Prosper recognized at once the man of the Café de Paris, the man with the grey moustaches and buttoned-up coat—Captain Rodet! Both were disconcerted—the meeting was not agreeable—but the young officer of dragoons, quickly recovering himself, inquired, in a haughty tone, what the veteran wanted with him.

"Very little, sir," replied the latter, in a tone of exquisite politeness. "I wish to return this to you, and at the same time to announce to you that, now you are so perfectly recovered, I will put it in your power to receive a portion of the remainder."

George had mechanically opened the paper handed to him by the captain. It contained a pellet of bread.

"Monsieur!" he said, and he was about to add, "I thought that a meeting, followed by a severe wound, was sufficient punishment for an act of thoughtlessness;" but there was something so austere and implacable in the veteran's looks, that the words stuck in his throat. But Prosper had not the same reasons as his friend for declining to reason upon the matter.

"Monsieur," he said, addressing the captain, "unless you are impelled by motives of personal hostility, I cannot understand what interest you can have in exacting another meeting on the part of M. George Benier. The insult was slight, you must admit, and is not your honor satisfied by the blood already spilt?"

But the veteran never wavered in the inflexible expression which he had assumed, and, with his eyes fixed on George, he awaited an answer without vouchsafing a reply to Prosper.

"Captain," said the former, seeing there was no alternative, "I do not accept the words pronounced by my friend. I am ready to meet you where and when you like, and we will fight as much as you like."

"To-morrow evening—the same place and the same hour as before," replied the captain, who had resumed his most affable manner.

"Be it so," replied George Benier.

Poor George! his skill in killing flies with pellets of bread was destined to entail a vast amount of misery. On the occasion of this his second encounter, anger and hatred of his rival imparted double strength to his arm, and gave unwonted vigor to his thrusts. But it was in vain; the veteran parried his sword as coolly as if fencing with foils. The struggle lasted a long time; George became exhausted by his efforts and exasperation, and at length fell on the greensward—the captain's sword had penetrated his chest. To add to his horror, as he lay fainting from loss of blood, he heard the old soldier say, "Adeau, till we meet again!"

This time George remained three months in bed, and another month in his arm-chair. During these long days of suffering and debility, friendship alone remained faithful to the poor patient. Love had taken its flight. The first day that George—whose life the surgeon had despaired of for three long weeks—was allowed to speak. Prosper felt inclined to avoid him, but George said:

"Stay, stay! Who would love me, if I were fool enough to quarrel with you?"

Prosper shook his head sorrowfully.

"Alas!" he said, "sickness tries friendship; and love, too, does it not? Well, frankly, you could not expect—"

"That Madame de Belmonte would become my nurse? No; most assuredly I did not expect that. But she did not send to inquire after me?"

"Yes, for four days consecutively."

"Four days! Well, when I get well I will send her four bracelets. We must not expect impossibilities."

What most surprised Prosper Dyonnet was, that as George Benier recovered his strength, instead of gaining spirits with improving health, he seemed to remain anxious, and at times sorrowful.

"What troubles you, George?" he inquired. "The doctor has said that on Saturday you can go out in the carriage, and yet you seem to experience some secret grief. Is it possible that the memory of Madame de Belmonte haunts you? She was not worthy of your love."

George, smiling grimly, replied:

"Prosper, I am melancholy, becanse I am afraid."

"Afraid of what?"

George contented himself with handing a card to his friend, and bnried his face in his hands.

"Captain Louis Rodet!" exclaimed Prosper. "Fool, idiot that I was! Yes, I understand now, my poor George. You need not blush; you fear to meet that man again, who is more implacable than if you had deprived him of honor, fortune, of all that was dear to him."

"Yes, Prosper, that is what I dread. He has still one pellet to receive satisfaction for, and he keeps it for the last. If I meet that man again, he will kill me."

"Listeu, George," said Prosper, taking a seat by his side. "That man is an assassin. I am not a soldier, and I should have recourse to other means of getting rid of so bloodthirsty an antagonist. I would denounce him to the police."

George shnddered.

"No," he said, "I would never humble myself to that extent. I have been an officer, and I conld not, without branding myself as a coward, take the step which you recommend."

"Well, then, George, there is only one alternative. We must separate."

"Why so?"

"Because you must go to Italy; and, what is more, you must leave this in a fortnight. You must remain there six months or a year.

THE THIRD PELLET.

George Benier, although deeply grieved to part from his friend, resolved, after mature consideration to follow his advice. A fortnight had not elapsed ere he was on his way to a change of climate and scenery. After a month's absence he had regained his health and spirits. He had dismissed from his mind all thoughts of his formidable creditor, who, possessed of a miserable pellet of bread instead of a dishonored bill, had made an ex-officer of dragoons take flight to other realms. It was at this epoch that his frieud Prosper received a long letter from him. It was dated 6th of September, 1825, Naples. Referring to previous communications, George reminded his friend that he had mentioned to him his having met a young person walking with her mother on the Monte Olivetto, with whom he had been very much smitten; that he had ascertained through his friend Count Popoli that the ladies were French, that the mother's name was Madame Castillion, that she was a widow, and wealthy; that the daughter's name was Blanche, that she was seventeen years of age, and pretty enough to put in a frame. Well, since he had made that communication he had been introduced to the parties, acquaintance had ripened into affection, and iu a month's time he was to be married at the church of San Domenico. He insisted upon Prosper Dyonnet being present at the wedding; he must come away at once. The ladies, on their side, expected one of their relations—a brother of Madame Castillon—whom he (George Benier) was said to be acquainted with; but they would not tell me his name, as they intended to give him an agreeable surprise! Perchance. he said, he and Dyonnet might travel together.

George was seated behind his betrothed in a box at the theatre of San Carlo. The curtain had just fallen upon the second act of an opera of Piccini's. George was muttering some words in Blanche's ear which made her smile. Madame Castillon, like a good mother that she was, was looking elsewhere, so that George might talk, and Blanche might smile.

Suddenly George, whose eyes were wandering mechanically towards the stalls, stopped in the middle of a phrase. He turned pale, and a groan, that almost resembled the rattle of a moribund, escaped from his chest. The two ladies, snrprised and terrified, turned toward him.

"Farewell! farewell!" he exclaimed.

And hurrying to the door of the box he threw himself into the corridor. and thence gained the square of San Carlo.

"Where is my carriage? Oh, here it is! Whip, coachman, whip!"

"Where is monsieur going to?"

"Where am I going? Where you like. Right before you, if you like it—only start."

Without replying, the driver mounted his box, and when the horses, worn out with the speed at which they were driven, came to a dead stop, George was eight leagues from Naples.

"What is the matter?" said George, putting his head out of the window. "Why don't we go on, John?"

"Because monsieur's horses cannot go any farther," replied John.

George jumped out, and, after some loss of time, it was ascertained that a village and post-house were close by, and thither he hastened. There happened at the very moment of his arrival to be a post-chaise at the door, to which a couple of post-horses were being harnessed. The master stood by superintending the operation.

"Monsieur," said George to this man, "I want two horses for my carriage."

The man shook his head.

"Very sorry, sir, but I have no more horses. These two are the last."

George rushed at the chaise and opened the door. A man—an Englishman, to judge by his whiskers—was seated within.

"Monsieur," said George, "I have a request of great importance to make to you."

"Speak, sir," replied the traveler, with an accent which did not belie his whiskers.

"Will you give up your horses?"

"Impossible, sir!"

"I will give you a thousand, two thousand francs, in exchange for the concession."

"I do not want your money, sir."

"Sir, your kindness will save my life."

"I have not time to be kind."

"Sir, I will make you repent your cruelty!"

"Repent! Ah! Postillion, stop a moment."

The Englishman stepped out of the chaise, and with characteristic calmness said:

"What do you mean, sir, by saying yon will make me repent?"

"What I meant I scarcely know. Perhaps I am mad; bnt, mad or not, it depends upon you to prevent me from being killed."

The Englishman looked hard at the young man, and then tnrning round as if to re-enter his chaise, he superciliously remarked:

"And what is it to me, sir, if you are killed?"

Goorge, irritated by his contemptuous indifference, raised his hand.

At the very moment a lond noise was heard on the road. It was a post-chaise coming at full gallop. George heard his own name called out in a well known voice.

"Ah! I am lost!" exclaimed the young man; and a cold perspiration bedewed his brow.

It was Captain Rodet in pursuit—it was Baptain Rodet who was calling to him. George saw him stepping rapidly toward him. At the sight of the man, whom he looked upon as his executioner, George advanced to the encounter.

"Kill me—assassinate me, sir," he exclaimed, "for I warn yon I shall not fight. I am a coward; I admit it. Kill me at once, for I am frightened of you!"

George, notwithstanding his unmanly avowal, stood in the presence of his enemy, his head erect, his arms crossed on his breast, as if awaiting death. The captain looked at the young as if a thunderstruck, but a strange smile played upon his lips. A little group of bystanders had, in the meantime, gathered around. The Englishman himself, taken aback by the strangeness of the scene, had forgotten to get into his chaise. Like the rest, he looked at George Benier and then at Captain Rodet in presence of one another.

At last the captain opened his mouth, and, holding out his right hand to George, "Who says anything about killing sir?" he said, in an affectionate tone. "Who speaks to you about fighting? Why should I kill you? I am Blanche's uncle, sir; and I come in her name to give you this trifle, which belongs to you—yourself."

George looked at the hand that was held out to him, and uttered an exclamation of joyful surprise. It contained the third pellet of bread! The captain renounced the last meeting, to which he was entitled by the code of honor!

Had Captain Rodet, in reply to George's invitation, raised a dagger at his breast, the young man would not have shrunk, but to find that he was forever delivered of an implacable hostility was too much for him. He fell fainting to the ground.

When he regained his consciousness he found himself on a bed in the inn, and Captain Rodet by his side. Involuntarily he shuddered; but the captain was smiling.

"What, sir," he said "are you——"

"Yes, I am going to be your uncle, young man—precisely so." And, as George was about to reply, "Two words more," said the old soldier. "I have, perhaps, shown myself very severe for a slight fault. I admit it. But my excuse—you will understand it, my excnse—good or bad, is, that I served the emperor and you served the Bourbons. Austerlitz could not permit itself to bo eclipsed by the Trocadero. But, so that you may not deem me more truculent than I really am, know, young man, that long before my sister wrote to me that you desired to be her son-in-law, I had made up my mind that I would no longer cross swords with you. It was quite enough twice, was it not?"

George rose up in his bed.

"From all this, captain, it results——"

"It results, my dear George, that you are going to marry a charming young person."

"That is not precisely what I was about to say, captain."

"What, then, were yon going to say, my dear young friend?"

"Why, captain, that I was frightened. I must confess it, I was horribly frightened."

The captain burst out into a joyous laugh.

"So frightened, that, to avoid fighting me, you were going to fight that Englishman because he would not cede his horses to you! Come, George," and the old soldier took him by the hand.

"But Blanche—bnt her mother! What shall we say to them to excuse my conduct?" said George, after reflecting a few seconds.

"We will tell them the trnth," exclaimed the captain; "it is far the shortest."

"True. I was mad when I ran away from Blanche."

"She thought so. Let her still deem you mad when you return."

"How so?"

"Madly in love!"

George wedded Blanche, and they were happy. The moral of which is, that if there had been no flies in the Café du Palais Royal in October, 1824, George Benier would never have fought—most probably—Captain Rodet. If Captain Rodet had not persecuted George, he would—most probably—have never gone to Italy. If he had not gone to Italy, he would—most probably—have never met Blanche and became Captain Rodet's happy nephew, and a respectable member of society. All's well that ends well.

MODERN ROME.

THE following pleasant bit of description is taken from Miss Edna Dean Proctor's last letter to the Independent:

The streets of Rome are a panorama of unending interest and variety. The open squares are full of sunshine and the music of fountains, and it is like going from noon to twilight to step from them into the narrow, damp streets, whose tall, overhanging houses sometimes almost shut out the sky. Most noticeable among the passers-by are the clergy and the monks, of all names and degrees, from the cardinals, with their superb black horses and liveried attendants, and their gorgeons scarlet and purple robes, which make them look like some gigantic cactus blossom, to the barefooted friars, with their shuffling gait and dull faces and greasy cowls—the light and shade of the church tableau. Then there are the multitude of strangers of all nations who have come to pass a week or a winter at Rome. On foot, on horseback, in carriages, they throng the piazza of St. Peter's, and wake the echoes of the Coliseum, and explore the Appian Way, pouring in a full tide on to the Pincian Hill during the fashionable hours of the late afternoon. Last and most attractive, there are the common people, the Romans of to-day. The babies, swathed like mummies, laugh and crow, and look on with wide-open eyes. The larger children swarm in the sunny places and beside the fountains; while the mothers knit or sew, or spin flax from a distaff, chattering the while in their liquid Italian. In Germany, France, and Switzerland it is rare to see a pretty woman among the laboring classes; but amoug these women of Rome there are many faces that a painter might love to give to canvas, or a sculptor to marble, so glowing is the color and so fine the form. The Lucretias, and Cecilias, and Livias are no more; but in the low, broad brows, the large, expressive eyes, the rich cheeks, the well-cut lips and noses, and the black, lustrous hair of some of these Giuliettas, and Marias, and Agneses, I fancy I see their transmitted charms. Nothing can be more picturesque than a group of these women, in their gay costumes, (a scarlet bodice, or a small bright shawl folded surplicewise across the bosom, their glossy braids of hair confined at the back with a silver pin or arrow, and always the gold or coral necklace and earrings, procured ofteu with difficulty and worn with pride) abroad with their children, bargaining in the market or gossiping, as they love to do, beside the clear fountain nnder the azure sky. As for the men, they throw the corner of their loose cloaks over the left shoulder, with a grace worthy of the ancient toga, and work, or lounge, or beg with equal ease and unconcern. Speaking of these handsome, dark women reminds me, by contrast, of one exquisitely fair, whom I saw at table d'hote at the Hotel de Grande Bretange, in Florence. Noticing her delicate bloom and her golden curls, tied with a blue ribbon, I said to myself, This must be a Scotch lassie—some lily of Liddesdale. After dinner, as I passed out of the room, I heard the waiter reply, to the inquiries of an anxious Englishman, "Yes, sir; the Duke and Duchess of Argyle and their daughter. They sat on the left of the table." So I was right, and the lovely flower was indeed of Scottish growth; the lily, not of Liddesdale, but of Inverary and the Clan Campbell.

SEWING MACHINES.—Mr. Alonzo Taylor, Manufacturer of Shuttle Stitch Sewing Machines, 90 East 39th Street, New York, states that he has purchased nearly a dozen Grover & Baker Machines for his friends, to be used in their families, because he thought they would do the work better than Shuttle Machines.

LITERARY GOSSIP AND GLEANINGS.

EMERSON'S NEW VOLUME.

THE appearance of Emerson's new volume of poems entitled "May-Day, and Other Pieces," just published by Ticknor & Fields, is one of the most noteworthy literary events of the season. The following is a characteristic extract, the source of which could scarcely be mistaken by any admirer of the Concord poet and philosopher:

I heard or seemed to hear the chiding Sea
Say, Pilgrim, why so late and slow to come?
Am I not always here, thy Summer home?
Is not my voice thy music, morn and eve?
My breath thy healthful climate in the heats.
My touch thy antidote, my bay thy bath?
Was ever building like my trresses?
Was ever couch magnificent as mine?
Lie on the warm rock-ledges, and there learn
A little lot suffices like a town.
I make your sculptured architecture vain,
Vain beside mine. I drive my wedges home,
And carve the coastwise mountain into caves.
Lo! here is Rome, and Nineveh, and Thebes,
Karnak, and Pyramid, and Giant's Stairs,
Half-piled or prostrate; and my newest slab
Older than all thy race.

Behold the Sea,
The opaline, the plentiful and strong.
Yet beautiful as is the rose in June,
Fresh as the trickling rainbow of July;
Sea full of food, the nourisher of kinds,
Purger of earth, and medicine of men;
Creating a sweet climate by my breath,
Washing out harms and griefs from memory,
And, in my mathematic ebb and flow,
Giving a hint of that which changes not.
Rich are the sea-gods: who gives gifts but they?
They grope the sea for pearls, but more than pearls.
They pluck Force thence, and give it to the wise.
For every wave is wealth to Dædalus.
Wealth to the cunning artist who can work
This matchless strength. Where shall we find, O waves!
A load your Atlas shoulders cannot lift?

I with my hammer pounding overcome
The rocky coast, smite Andes into dust,
Strewing my bed, and, in another age,
Rebuild a continent for better men.
Then I unbar the doors; my paths lead out
The exodus of nations: I disperse
Men to all shores that front the hoary main.

I too have arts and sorceries:
Illusion dwells forever with the wave.
I know what spells are laid. Leave me to deal
With credulous and imaginative man;
For, though he scoop my water in his palm,
A few rods off he deems it gems and clouds.
Planting strange fruits and sunshine on the shore,
I make some coast alluring, some lone isle.
To distant men, who must go there or die.

"TENNYSONIANA."

This is the title of a small volume of about 170 pages, written by some fervent admirer of the genius of the English Laureate, who has devoted much time and industry to a kind of work seldom undertaken during the life of the person who is its subject. It contains many curious results of a careful collection and collation of the different editions of Tennyson's poems, together with numerous personal details which will be interesting to the poet's admirers, and extremely valuable to his future biographer. Our knowledge of the book is derived from the notices of it in the foreign papers, one of which says:

"It seems that the first literary production of Alfred Tennyson appeared about forty years ago. It was printed and publised at Louth, in Lincolnshire (Tennyson's native county) and was entitled 'Poems by Two Brothers.' The 'two brothers' were Alfred and Charles Tennyson, though their names did not appear on the title-page. Alfred was at that time in the eighteenth year of his age; and he and his brother, with becoming modesty, adopted as their motto the following words from Martial—'Hæc nos novimus esse nihil' (We know this to be nothing). 'R. H. S.' gives us but few specimens of this volume; but we may safely infer that the contents were poor enough. Some of the titles suggest the old poetical commonplaces of young beginners—'Lines to Memory,' 'The Exile's Harp,' 'Remorse,' 'We Meet no More,' 'To Fancy,' 'Midnight,' Friendship,' 'On Sublimity,' 'Time, an Ode,' etc. Others have an odd tone of something formal and old-fashioned; as, 'Lines to One who Entertained a Light Opinion of an Eminent Character.' 'On the Death of my Grandmother,' 'On being asked for a Simile to illustrate the Advantage of keeping the Passions subservient to Reason,' 'Short Eulogium on Homer,' etc. Others, again, betray that the brothers shared in the then prevalent excitement in favor of the Hellenes; for we find poems called 'Greece,' and 'Exhortation to the Greeks.' Byron seems to have had a powerful influence on the minds of the youthful poets; one of their pieces is called 'On the Death of Lord Byron,' and lines from the author of 'Childe Harold' are frequently used as mottoes. The first conspicuous work of Alfred Tennyson was his Cambridge Prize Poem, 'Timbuctoo' (1829), which was very eulogistically noticed in the Athenæum of July 22nd of that year, and which was certainly distinguished by some noble passages. In 1830 appeared 'Poems, chiefly Lyrical, by Alfred Tennyson." This was the volume which contained 'Mariana in the Moated Grange.' It was well received upon the whole—the Westminster Review (in an article, it is thought, by Mr. John Stuart Mill) hailing it as a work of great promise; Leigh Hunt, in the Tatler, contrasting the two brothers, in a series of articles, and concluding by giving the palm to Alfred; and Professor Wilson, in Blackwood's Magazine, 'mingling praise and blame,' as Tennyson afterward told us, in some very stinging verses. After the appearance of the volume of 1833, Coleridge said of Tennyson that some of his poems showed 'a good deal of beauty,' but he added that he had 'begun to write verses without very well understanding what metre is.' And he 'prescribed' to him to write for two or three years 'in none but one or two well-known and strictly-defined metres, such as the heroic couplet, the octave stanza, or the octosyllabic measure,' as a corrective to the looseness of his new metres, some of which Coleridge said he could scarcely scan. Woodsworth, in 1845, spoke of Tennyson as 'Decidedly the first of our living poets,' though it seems that he had originally, unlike Leigh Hunt, regarded Charles as the better poet. The very curious little volume of 'R. H. S. contains a great many collations of first and second readings of passages in the chief poems (Tennyson is a great corrector); a complete list of the poet's writings; an account of the Tennyson portraits; various literary and biographical particulars, and some remarks on Tennyson's versification, in which it is shown that the stanza of 'In Memoriam' is borrowed from Ben Johnson."

EDMUND YATES' HARRIET ROUTH.

The London Spectator, in a decidedly clever criticism of Edmund Yates' novel, "Black Sheep," has some judicious and rather striking comments on Harriet Routh, by far the most original character in the book, and one that is drawn with considerable psychological insight. The critic says:

"Mr. Yates has tried to sketch in her one of the most singular, yet not most infrequent of mental phenomena—the loss of identity, the merging, as it were, of one nature into another so absolutely that it assists in evil, without, so far as human eye can trace, itself becoming as evil as its partner. Harriet Routh, a clever governess of good emotions and no particular principles, meets her husband, a villainous black-leg, dying in an inn on the Continent. Moved by some instinct or an irresistible pity, she refuses to let him die alone, nurses him, is dismissed by her employers, and on his recovery marries him. Thenceforward she becomes absorbed in him, till her own nature seems to disappear: enters into his nefarious projects, aids with him the higher courage and brighter brain than his own to swindle friends; becomes, in fact, an accomplice, while remaining the cheerful, loving, devoted, unselfish wife.

All this while, it is impossible, though she has sunk in action to the sharper's level, to hold her morally equally degraded. By a thousand touches, some of them, we suspect, unconscious, as if Mr. Yates were sketching something he had seen and only half understood, the author gives us to understand that she is not lost; that virtues remain, though all are misdirected. She is a swindler absolutely truthful to herself and her husband, a cheat who is absolutely sincere, a loving woman who is pitiless to all but one, but has, in her mad concentration to that one, scarcely human sympathies for others—a woman full, to use the only word which will express the thought, of piety, but a piety for him, not God. It is not an ordinary passion which is described, but an absolute merging of the identity of the moral nature, such as some heretics have tried to believe the true relation of woman to man. You feel that, but for Routh, Harriet would be a queenly nature. At last it becomes essential to his plans to commit a murder—very artistically suppressed as to details by Mr. Yates—and throw the suspicion on a friend; and Harriet, cognizant of the former, personally arranges for the latter. Then comes the finest stroke Mr. Yates probably ever conceived.

Murder differs from all other crimes in the remorse it creates, and most novelists would have made Harriet repent. He makes her break. She has lost her identity too completely to repent; at all events till Routh does; but she bows down under the scathing effect of crime; begins, for the first time in her life, to think of risk, to feel fear and doubt; her head gets hot, her veins fill, and once she urges her husband to escape, leaving her to face consequences alone. He, all the while, in his meanness, is beginning, as one who knows too much, to fear and hate her; but even estrangement or treachery cannot restore her moral nature; she protects him to the last, once using his mistress to do it, and when all is discovered, carries him poison in prison; and then, with full means of retreat before her, drags herself to the outer gate, and thinking how he is dying within, sits till either by death, heart-break, or by poison, she terminates her existence with his. It is the passion which Mary of Scots entertained for Bothwell described, and well described, in a sharper's wife.

This is at least a striking idea, so striking that we wish its execution were more equal and more thorough. It is too sketchily done. We do not see enough of Harriet or Harriet's mind, and the original design is marred by two great blots. Such cases of absolutely merged identity, of one nature so absorbed in another as to leave no room for judgment on that other's acts certainly do occur, but they always demand two conditions. First, that the merged nature shall not be absolutely superior at all points to the one in which it is merged, and Harriet Routh's is. Routh has nothing in him whatever that we can see—has not his wife's courage, or brain, or unselfishness, or capacity of loving, or sovereign strength of will. There is no reason why his wife's will should in his presence cease to act except in accord with his, yet if it does not, where is the excuse for her? Does not Mr. Yates see that good remains in Harriet in spite of her criminality, because to be criminal one must will crime, and her will is, as it were, paralized, or rather exhausted, by excessive concentration on the single resolve to be one with her husband. That in her antiseptic, the one thing which preserves her nature from rotting as all natures rot under crime; and to make his will so inferior to hers that hers cannot have ceased to operate, not to spend on him some of the labor he has spent on her, is defective art."

A SOUTHERN DRAMA.—A Memphis paper contains an account of a poem "by a lady," which is entitled Helvington, a Dramatic Story, and which may be properly ranked among the curiosities of literature. Here is an extract, showing the style in which Isabel Rivers, the heroine, and her mother talk of the passage of the Sixth Massachusetts Regiment through Baltimore:

"MRS. R.—Oh! would I could forget!
It is too deeply graved upon my mind—
That first dark day that ushered in the train
Of all our days of woe—that accursed day,
Th' insulting tread of Lincoln's men, his hosts
Of low born hirelings fell upon the streets
Of proud old Baltimore.
"ISABEL.— * * * * * * *
And my dear father, fired with patriotic hate
And scorn for tyranny, rushed from his hearth
To meet, to fuce, that coward host—defied, and—died!"

The heroine and her mother being confined in Fort Lafayette, thus discuss the binding obligation of oaths of allegiance:

"ISABEL.—I'd pile up oaths until they reached the sky,
And every one as false as the false foe
That forces them on us, sooner than have
Our pearl defaced—our darling Murgaret!"
* * * * * * * *
"MRS. R.—Let your untaught tongue run glib
With Lincoln's ooths—repress the scorn you feel—
High Heaven will not record the sin against you."

They both take the oath upon the Bible. The band striking up Yankee Doodle, Isabel is made to exclaim:

"Detested air!
Fit symphony for oaths as false as this!"

Miss Augusta Evans, the "Great Southern Novelist," must look to her laurels.

BOYHOOD'S PLEASURES AND PENALTIES.—A youngster came home after having a glorious time in the puddles, his face all aglow and his boots full of water. The punishment of staying in the house for the remainder of the day did not seem very hard; but as his little heart warmed up with the recollection of the triumphs of the morning, when he had waded deeper than any of his playmates dared to, he could bear the restraint no longer, and went to his mother saying, "Please, mother, whip me, and let me go out again!" Human nature could not resist such an appeal, and, though the mother's heart had some misgivings as to the propriety of indulging her son, he was allowed his liberty, and received a caress instead of a flogging.

ORIGIN OF THE TERM PERFUME.—The first perfumes were obtained by a combustion of aromatic woods and gums (hence the name perfumum, "through smoke") and the first use primitive nations made of them was to offer them on the altars erected to their gods, perhaps with the mystic idea that their prayers would reach them sooner wafted on the blue wreaths of smoke, or for the less poetical purpose of counteracting the smell of the flesh burned in their sacrifices. Modern incense derives its sweet balsamic smell from benzoin (Styrax benzoin), which also formed one of the chief ingredients in pastilles and fumigating papers.—Rimmel on Flowers and their Uses.

VALE!

THE staff is crumbling in my hand,
The pride is breaking in my heart;
The soul of fire is smouldering ashes,
The flame of Life will soon depart.

Bright shining stars will shine for others,
Dear flowers will bloom for other eyes;
The Moon for lovers trim her crescent,
And sail across the evening skies.

But I shall sleep—perchance forever,
While others laugh, and others weep;
While others to delights surrender
Which I have had but could not keep.

The changeful living will froget me,
I breathe it with a sob of pain;
The changeless dead—I shall be with them
Whose world is either loss or gain.

Well—be it so, since so it must be,
The grave is narrow, dark and cold;
And but that gallant spirits rest there,
To die would be despair untold.

Farewell, sweet Muse! ah, I have been
Your constant lover—bootless wooer;
Farewell to friends most sorely tried,
Whose largess did not wait the suer.

Farewell to mountains, cloud-aspiring,
Whose heights ambitious youth has trod;
Farewell to seas whose mighty breakers
The feet of strength have walked unshod.

Farewell to day's sunshiny glory,
Farewell to twilight's tender glow;
Farewell to all the gentle pleasures
That Nature's guileless children know.

Farewell, farewell! there is no morrow,
The lists are closed, the world rolls by;
A warrior leaves the wide arena,
Whose shield is blank, whose blade is dry,

STREET CAR REFLECTIONS.

BY PRENTICE.

A FEW mornings since, a young man with his arm in a sling became my fellow passenger. He brought with him a companion with whom he conversed in a loud tone of voice. He told him how his arm was crushed, how it hurt him, and how the surgeon set it. He gave us a graphic idea of the setting of broken bones, and the exquisite pain attendant on such operations. He gave particular attention also to the crushing so that no effort was requisite by a vivid imagination to conceive a lively image of macerated human flesh and bones. All of us could hear him above the rumble of the car. It was interesting—especially to the narrator. If not entirely agreable to his involuntary and confined audience, it was thrilling and conducive to cold chills.

Once we thought he had ended. This was a mistake. He had but stopped to take breath and reinforce his recollection. There were a few details relative to the setting which had not been sufficiently wrought up to suit him, and these he manipulated with such diabolical skill that all the hearers could themselves feel the twists and wrenches the young man felt while undergoing the manipulations of his anotomical carpenter. How, for the time being, we wished it had been his neck! And the young man's fearful narrative went on and on, and round and round, until he and his accompanying listener stepped out of the car.

That listener, by the way, was quite as reprehensible as the fractured young man. Had he not been along there would have been no human receptacle for the inpouring of this horrible tale.

Yet why am I so selfish as to begrudge that young man the pleasure of telling his story? It does him good. Perhaps it is his only recompense for the suffering and weary hours resulting from the accident. I ought not to have been annoyed at the discourse, for from my youth up I have suffered a terrible breakfast and tea-table experience, in the recital of distressing cases of disease and death-bed experiences from elderly ladies of strong religious tendencies, but tinged with ghoul-like inclinations. I ought, by this time, to be used to such things.

Then I found myself sorry because he had left. I discovered that he had amused as well as annoyed me. He had made my other fellow beings uncomfortable. Of course in that there were a few grains of satisfaction. Misery loves company, a miserable love, however, of misery.

There is a man in our car who is evidently in a great hurry to terminate his trip. He fidgets and twist and looks out of the window to note the distance accomplished. He is in great twitterdegee externally, and a greater one internally. Mentally, he is in the condition of a decapitated hen. He is uncomfortable because he knows not how to wait. Waiting, is a science. To learn to wait is to learn to be patient; to learn to be patient is to study and investigate. Study and investigation lead to discovery; discovery to happiness. I know this. I have swallowed oceans of misery for years and years in waiting for almost everthing a man can wait for, and I am waiting for many things yet. It is by waiting we are made to see what is going on around us, and next what is transpiring inside of us.

Our impatient friend has sent his soul far ahead of him to his place of destination, and the poor soul vainly strives to drag the body after it. Hence, impatience, vain longing, restlessness.

My dear wretch, do try and see if you cannot enjoy, and at the same time improve this bit of the present which is always with you. Now the admonition "improve your time" has, in consequence of early and disagreeable associations, a harsh and gloomy sound to many of us. I was constantly, when a child, pestered with this precept, by parents, guardians, ministers, deacons, Sunday-School teachers, and a great many other people, who said it because they did not know what else to say, and who did not exactly comprehend what they were saying either, just as some good people think they must quote, and often misquote, scripture, while visiting the sick.

So, being a conscientious and obedient urchin, I strove to improve my time. I read and perspired over works greatly above my comprehension, I twisted my legs in a nervous embrace of those of the table, and ran out my tongue in spiral contortions, while vainly endeavoring to write political, metaphysical and philosophical essays. Finally, I became tired and disgusted. I gave up trying to "improve the time" and "not to lose a moment." I became a bad boy. I went over to the enemy. From the model boy of the Academy I became a Benedict Arnold, and to the Sunday School a Judas Iscariot. There was no one in those days who knew how to show me rightly the method of improving time. I mistook the road and tried to become somebody else.

But you, my unfortunate impatient, need make no such mistake. You are looking from your windows at that shrew who so vigorously inflicts castigation on her unfortunate child for falling in the gutter. You are thinking of the injustice of the punishment. You are indignant at the woman. Now look inside. Why did you speak so cross to your own responsibilities just before leaving home? Because one wanted a pair of new shoes. Because another had brought home a miserable stray dog for a pet. You do not like dogs. They are useless and expensive. Billy has littered up the back yard in the construction of a rabbit pen. It is chaotic in design and the materials are widely and untidily dispersed. Besides you do not fancy rabbits about the house. Hence the domestic typhoon which signalized your departure. Which stands highest, you or the shrew?

There steps in old Dogmatic as pompous and conceited as ever. How you dislike him! And yet it was but yesterday you looked down with just such an air of superiority on that poor restaurant waiter when he mistook your order.

You are very much disgusted at the good-natured specimen of intoxication who has just entered with a red and gray complexion, the red being the alcoholic bloom, the gray resulting from an unshaven beard, who persists in talking to you, and who shows symptoms of a design of embracing.

Good-natured inebriation when in the embracing mood, is worse than combative inebriation. The latter can be kicked out if fortunately sufficiently demonstrative, but the former must be endured. Even an angel on one of those "visits, few and far between," to realize our idea of an angel, must come sober. Do you suppose you could endure a drunken angel at a select private party?

Well, you are disgusted and annoyed. You bind that miserable man hand and foot and toss him into the scales. You heap on the weights of condemnation and your own rectitude. The inebriate rises high in the balance and is found wanting, until suddenly there flashes upon your mind the recollection of your own condition on that very same car some three months ago, when you made such extrordinary speeches to a lady with whom you had a passing acquaintance. Then there is not so great a discrepancy in weight after all.

"Well, all this moralizing may be very useful but I don't see the enjoyment of the thing," says our impatient friend.

Has not the time passed the quicker for these thoughts? That is one point gained. Unpleasant they may be. Nearly all the initiatory steps toward true happiness are unpleasant. You crept and stumbled before you could walk, you stammered before you could talk, you cut a most ridiculous figure in learning to waltz, you howled dismally before your voice was attuned to melody, and you practiced laboriously and drove many unfortunates compelled to remain within hearing nearly distracted ere you could manipulate the piano with such art and skill.

In these affections you are treading on the boundaries of the vast territory of soul within you, full of grand avenues of thought to be traveled with the vigorous stride of youth, of retired lanes in which you may leisurely walk, and of shady nooks and dells where you may repose. No other territory in the world is like unto it, no more than you are like anyone else. No one save you can explore it. There are battles to be fought, however, and it must be conquered ere it can be possessed. As you press forward, other and more beautiful views will constantly open beyond still tempting you onward, yet memory will always carry you back to the sweet spots passed over. It may be entered by many humble gates and one of them is our street car.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

THE spectacular play of The Elves ran at Maguire's Opera House until last night, when The Naiad Queen was produced in fine style, with Mrs. Sophie Edwin as "Surline," Miss Sallie Hinckley as "Sir Rupert," and the entire corps de ballet of the Martinetti Troupe in dances, marches and tableaux. This attractive spectacular piece will be presented this afternoon and evening. During the present holiday times it is fit that these spectacular fairy plays in which children so much delight should be produced.

During the coming week the romantic drama entitled The Spanish Dancers will be produced.

This afternoon and evening the Mikado Japanese Troupe give their last two performances at the Academy of Music. Those who have not yet witnessed the wonderful screen act as performed by Goshigeero and his pretty daughter, Miss Oyonshkeo, should not fail to be present at either the morning or evening performance. The rope-walking and balancing feats performed by this troupe are very wonderful, and far surpass those performed by the troupes which preceded them.

On Monday the Academy of Music will remain closed. On Tuesday the inmates of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum will give a public exhibition in this theater. The proceeds will be devoted to their library fund. The pantomime of the impersonators of "The French Spy," "The Old Corporal," and other mute characters is far surpassed by the wonderful performances of these stricken ones whom art has instructed how to supply the deficiencies of nature. All who have witnessed the pantomime of the mutes have been delighted. An entertainment such as this should attract at least as large a house as assembles to witness the feats of Japanese gymnasts.

This afternoon and evening Harry Leslie and Harry Raynor, Henrie Herberte, Miss Julia Gould and the troupe of minstrels will give their two last performances. The burlesque opera of Maritana, which has been such a popular feature of the performance during the week, will be presented this evening for the last time. Those who have not listened to the clever songs of Harry Leslie and Harry Raynor, laughed at their grotesque negro acts and been present at the capital operatic performance have missed a treat.

On Monday the Great Dragon Troupe of Japanese jongleurs, equilibrists, rope dancers and musical and dancing girls, will make their appearance at the Metropolitan Theater. In this troupe we have conjurors, a clown, many balancers, numerous acrobats, O-mu-tu-san, a Japanese ballat girl, and other artistes—twenty-six in all. These performers are, we are assured, all high artistes in their profession, and are confidently backed by the management to quite surpass all the performers who have left Japan. Their stay in San Francisco must be limited to a few days, as they are bound for the Paris Exposition.

The next sensation in the dramatic world which we may expect is the arrival of Edwin Adams, who is due on Tuesday. He will probably open his engagement at Maguire's Opera House the week after next, in Hamlet.

There is some talk of producing sacred operas on Sunday. Whether or not this will conflict with the Sabbatarians' pet law remains to be proved.

Mrs. Laura Cuppy lectures as usual to-morrow at the Mechanics' Institute Hall.

The celebrated Do Save troupe of male and female gymnasts will appear at the Academy of Music next week on the off nights of the Opera season. The ladies of this troupe perform the Niagara Leap and numerous feats on the trapeze.

TOUCHSTONE.

WOODWARD'S GARDENS.—The curious wild beasts, the beautiful flowers, the collection of paintings and other works of art, delight crowds who daily flock to these gardens. No more delightful spot for a picnic can be found than these pleasure grounds.

PACIFIC MUSEUM.—No less than three pickled murderer's heads are to be seen at this establishment. The most wonderful freaks of nature are exhibited here as well as models of all parts of the human frame.

CALIFORNIA WINES—The fame of California wines is spreading far and wide, and the choice varieties may be found on the dinner tables of the high and mighty ones of New York and other Eastern States. Some of the best wines which have gained for California this high reputation as a wine growing country, have been produced by the United Anaheim Wine-Growers' Association, 351 Montgomery street. B. Dreyfus, the manager, assures us that he has at present some Port and Angelica wine, which has seldom, if ever, been equalled on this coast.

STATUE OF CLEOPATRA.

WHAT! this cold quarry-stuff for Antony's queen;
Marble for fire; the sculptured art of eyes
For that consummate passion that, between
Love and desire, shook kingdoms with her sighs.

Yet thus she might have looked when the red asp
Had sucked the sultry Egypt from her veins;
But not when love-warm from her warrior's clasp,
The sweet mouth blossomed with the mixed lip stains.

Those beautiful lips and bountiful, that crushed
The blood-red out of his own, and clung
With ripe possession till the bosom blushed,
And all the seething senses swayed and swung.

Eyes that smote eyes with blindness, perilous deep
As soundless cisterns of delirious light;
Limbs, lustrous as the lotus-laving sweep
Of the Nile waters when the moon is white.

The sumptuous sense of woman; the rare feast
Of queenly body and voluptuous breath,
To comfort and make glad the enamoured beast
That crawls and basks and bites it to the death.

ENGINE-DRIVERS AND THEIR WAYS.

MR. FRITH'S "Railway Station" is one of the most popular pictures ever painted, and all the officials in it are taken from life. The driver is from a photograph; and it will interest the readers of these lines, should he go to see the picture, to know that this very man made, it is believed, the fastest trip ever known. This was from London to Didcot; he accomplished the journey, just fifty-three miles, in forty-seven minutes. It happened that a comrade had run the trip in forty-seven and a half, and Mr. Frith's hero resolved to beat him. He did beat him; and another first-rate man openly declared his determination to do it in less time; but an order was judiciously issued which stopped this rather alarming rivalry. The desire to run excessively fast is, curiously enough, generally traceable to the pride each man has in his engine, which may be compared to the well-known feeling of the groom toward his horse. The engine-driver has too much riding and tearing along to care for racing on his own account; but that the "Rhinoceros" should be beaten by the "Hippopotamus" is not to be borne. Even good-tempered men become offensive when championing the merits of their engines; it is so difficult for them to exalt their favorite without depreciating competitors. To what a pitch this feeling goes may be illustrated by a little anecdote. A man who had just come in from a very long trip with a goods train—only those who are familiar with railway work can appreciate the difference between driving a goods train for one hundred and twenty miles and doing the same amount of passenger work—threw his greatcoat across his arm, and, swinging his can and basket in his right hand, walked slowly and heavily up the slope homewards, his fireman slouching behind him. Bed was evidently his immediate destination, and the poor fellow wanted rest badly enough. Great, therefore, was the surprise of his chief—and I may say of myself too—to see, about fifty minutes afterwards, the same driver coming down the slope, followed again by his fireman, carrying greatcoat, can, and basket, all as before.

"Beg your pardon, sir," said the driver, "but I hear you are a going to send 'Kaffir'—this was the name of the engine—out again to-night, with Tom Baldwin."

"Yes," replied the chief; "you know we are very short of engines."

"Well, sir," returned the man, "he's not a bit of good to her; he don't understand her, sir; he'll spoil her; and if you'll allow me, sir, me and my mate will run the trip to night."

"You!" exclaimed the superintendent; "you can't—you're knocked up."

"Not a bit of it, sir," replied the driver. "Anyhow, sir, I can do more with 'Kaffir' than he can, and I'll never have such an engine drove by him, if I can help it."

And out of devotion to his great, ungainly goods engine, the driver, instead of going to bed, chose to pass another night without sleep, and to run over another six or seven score miles of rail.

Sometimes the feeling will manifest itself in a still stranger manner. An excellent plan is adopted on railways of taking the pressure off old boilers—that is, when an engine has run a certain number of miles, although no symptoms of weakness may appear, yet as wear must have been going on, the pressure at which the steam blows off is reduced from, say, one hundred and twenty pounds to the square inch, by which, of course, the bursting of the boiler is rendered more improbable. It may be noticed here that so great an improvement in quality of fuel and completeness of combustion has, during the last few years, been effected, that an engine will run thirty or forty thousand more miles with the same set of tuoes than would have worn it out some years back. Of course, when the pressure of steam is reduced, the power of the engine is reduced in proportion, and I have known a driver, whose favorite engine was in the factory for repairs, wait upon the engineer and beg and pray, as the phrase goes, that authority to forego his intention of diminishing the pressure; being quite willing to risk his own life and that of his fireman rather than his iron steed should suffer in her reputation for speed and drawing power. Not, be it understood, that any engine has any reputation beyond her driver, and a very few equal.

It will be easily understood that engine-drivers are intensely professional; the ruling spirit, I have no doubt, is strong with them in death, though this, of course, I cannot easily prove. I know of one instance, however, where the engine, at some obstacle, leaped from the line when running at great speed on a high embankment. "It's all up, mate," exclaimed the driver, "but hold on to the brake." His mate did so, while he held on to the regulator. The engine and tender turned right over, and pitched with terrific force into a meadow below. No one could ever account for the escape of the men, but beyond stunning each of them for a short time, and knocking out the whole of driver's front teeth, no great harm was done.

I really think, although I by no means urge the companies to relax the stringency of their rules on the point, and would certainly rather not travel by the train while the experiment was trying, that even a drunken driver would hardly make any mistake in his signals, and in support of this an odd illustration may be given. A driver, not on duty, had been drinking, and was, in company with his fireman, walking in the vicinity of the Edeware Road, when he suddenly started violently, and seizing his mate's arm, shouted:

"Hold hard, mate—hold hard!"

"What's the matter?" cried the fireman.

"Matter!" roared the driver, "why, you're running by the red light;" and he pointed to the crimson glare which streamed through a glass bottle in a chemist's window.

"Come along; that's nothing," said the fireman, trying to drag him on.

"What, run by the red light, and go afore Dannel in the morning?" retorted the driver, and no persuasion could or did get him to pass the shop. He was a Great Western man, and the "Dannel" whom he held in such wholesome awe was the celebrated engineer, now Sir Daniel Gooch, and chairman of that line. He was then the locomotive chief, and renowned above all other things for maintaining discipline among his staff, while they cherished a feeling for him very much akin to what we hear of the clannish enthusiasm of the ancient Scotch.

As a rule, as is well known, engine-drivers are a very hardy race. Indeed, few delicate constitutions can hope to survive the long and severe course by which only the cleaner or laborer can attain the position of driver. I was told some years back—for things are changed a great deal for the better on most lines now—by a man who used to run for a company which was encouraging a mineral traffic—a long way, by the by, from London—that he has several times, while on his journey, woke, and found his fireman asleep. The change in the sound as the train ran through the station was sufficient to attract his practised ear; but that he should have been knocked up was no miracle, as his down trip averaged seventeen hours; and without more time to spare than was required to arrange the train, he had to come back the same journey.

Some of the men, as some of all classes will do, certainly abuse their fine constitutions. I have known a man never dry or change his clothes, save on Sundays, all through a winter: throw his soaked and dripping garments on a chair when he came in tired and went to bed, and put the same articles on when he rose, though they clung to him with damp. He stood this, and lives still; but for one who braves this danger with impunity, a host may sink. Consumption on our railways, as everywhere else, claims its full proportion of victims.

I have alluded to a driver's coolness and resolution in an accident, but no chronicle ever has or ever will be written which will tell one tithe of the accidents which the courage and presence of mind of these men have averted. A railway ran over a river—indeed, it might be called an arm of the sea: as it was the inlet to an important harbor, provision was obliged to be made for the shipping, and so the piece of line, which crossed the water, at a height of seventy feet, was, in fact, a bridge, which swung round when large vessels had to pass. I need hardly say that such a point was carefully guarded. At each end, at a fitting distance, a man was placed specially to indicate whether the bridge was open or shut. One day, as the express was tearing along on its up journey, the driver received the usual "all right" signal; but to his horror, on coming in full sight of the bridge, he found it wide open, and a gulf of fatal depth yawning before him. He sounded his brake-whistle, that deep toned scream which signals the guard, and he and his fireman held on, as before described, to the brake and regulator. The speed of the train was, of course, checked; but so short was the interval, so great had been the impetus, that it seemed almost impossible to prevent the whole train from going over into the chasm. Had the rails been in the least degree slippery, any of the brakes out of order, or the driver less determined, there would then have occurred the most fearful railway accident ever known in England; but by dint of quick decision and cool courage, the danger was averted; the train was brought to a standstill when the buffers of the engine absolutely and literally overhung the chasm. Three yards more, and a different result might have had to be chronicled.

Some of my readers may remember an incident in railway history which dates back to our first great Exibition. I mention it here for its singularity, and for my having known the driver whose coolness was so marked. In ascending a very long gradient, the hindermost carriages of the train snapped their couplings when at the top; the engine rattled on with the remainder, while these ran down the slope, which was several miles in length, with a velocity which of course increased every moment. To make matters worse, the next train on the same line was comparatively close behind, and, in fact, shortly came in sight. The driver of this second train, a watchful and experienced hand, saw the carriages rushing toward him, and divined that they were on the same line. If he continued steaming on, of course, in a couple of minutes he would come into direct collision with them, while, on the other hand, if he ran back, the carriages would probably gather such way, that they would leap from the bank. So, with great presence of mind, and wonderful judgment of speed, he ran back at a pace not quite as fast as the carriages were approaching, so that eventually they overtook him, and struck his moving engine with a blow that was scarcely more preceptible than the jar usually communicated by coupling on a fresh carriage. When this was done, all the rest was easy; he resumed his down journey, and pushed the frightened passengers safely before him until they reached their destination, where the officials, as may readily be supposed, were in a state of frantic despair at the loss of half the train.

These anecdotes could be multiplied to almost any extent, as could the gloomy, yet strangely fascinating record of accidents to the men. It is a common saying that steam is a mighty power, yet very few of those who repeat the saying reflect for a moment how mighty it is. It is difficult to understand how tremendous is the force, until you have seen something of the mischief it can do. The best way to appreciate the might of steam is to look at a locomotive engine after an explosion. The weight of a first-rate locomotive engine, with its tender, is between sixty and seventy tons, which simple fact speaks all that is necessary to be said as to its solidity and strength. It is always built of the very best materials; it may not have occurred to the reader to observe, that, when an inquest is held or any kind of inquiry instituted consequent upon an engine accident, it never happens that the fault arises from the engine having been constructed of bad or even inferior material. Nor, and this is very curious, does an engine ever explode when in motion; I have know many cases of explosion, and they have always been while the engine is at rest.

In spite of the censures so often, because so easily, launched at railway directors and managers, I do sincerely believe that every exertion and device which ingenuity and experience can suggest, is used to prevent accidents, and to insure the punctual working of trains. As railway carriages are very expensive things, and the cost of a first-rate engine is more than three thousand pounds, it can easily be understood how a slight collision, even with goods trains, for instance, which never even finds its way into print, may entail a really awful expense. This, however, is going a little beyond my theme, relative to which, should any reader feel any curiosity, I should advise the cultivation of a little intimacy with some one of the many worthy fellows in the class of which I have written.

ENGLISH CLUBS.—The last number of the Galignani's Messenger contains the following in regard to admission into the popular London clubs:

Club-land is just now much troubled and full of desultory turmoil, by reason of the number of candidates for admission who are unable to make their way within its charmed confines. The pressure from without and the resistance from within are much more vehement than those of the unenfranchised who wish for the suffrage, and the now privileged minority who hesitate as to the degree in which they would extend it. The "Carlton" was full long ago, and a "Junior Carlton" is already beginning to rise opposite the old one. To gain admission to the "Athenæum" you must spend half a lifetime in the state of probation. The "Travelers" is practically inaccessible, partly owing to the fastidiousness of those who have the power to admit, but partly, also, to the physical impossibility of affording room to more than a limited number within circumscribed precincts. "Brooks'" maintains with Whig dignity its inflexible limitation to five hundred, which excludes of necessity scores of peers and commoners of undeniable eligibility, but which precludes the annoyance and vexation caused in less exclusive quarters by the putting up of numerous names for ballot practice, with the inevitable results in wounded and missing. There was last week a battue at the "Reform," six gentlemen out of eight were what is called "peppered," an equal number having been blackballed the week before, and this for no other reason that can be intelligibly assigned than that the House is already too full, and that the beleaguered garrison do not choose to share the necessaries and comforts of life with strangers, however individually likeable.

GENIUS.

FAR out at sea the sun was high,
While veered the wind and flapped the sail;
We saw a snow-white butterfly
Dancing before the fitfull gale—
Far out at sea.

The little stranger who had lost
His way, of peril nothing knew;
Settled awhile upon the mast,
Then fluttered o'er the waters blue—
Far out at sea.

Above there gleamed the boundless sky,
Beneath the boundless ocean sheen;
Between them danced the butterfly,
The spirit-life in this vast scene—
Far out at sea.

Away he sped, with skimmering glee,
Dim, indistinct, now seen, now gone;
Night comes, with wind and rain, and he,
No more shall dance before the sun—
Far out at sea.

He dies, unlike his mates I ween;
Perhaps not sooner nor worse crossed;
But he has felt and known and seen
A larger life and hope, though lost—
Far out at sea.

TEMPUS FUGIT.

ONE of the best stories we remember referring to a stolen watch comes from a Frauch source. In the pit of the old Frenoh opera, one of the audience suddenly discovered that his watch was gone. The evening's entertainment had not commenced, and the owner of the property mounted a bench, stated the loss, which could not have occurred above two or three minutes, and begged those around him to remain perfectly quiet, as his watch struck the hours like a clock, and, it then being on the stroke of seven, the watch would speedily indicate into whose possession it had fallen. There was a dead silence; but the eye of the proprietor detected an individual who was trying to edge away from the vicinity, and he immediately denounced the skulker as the thief. The latter was seized, and the watch was found upon him; and as the owner quietly put it into his pocket, he remarked, "The watch does not strike the hours, hut I thought my assertion that it did would enable me to strirke out the thief."

"Does your watch go well?" asked a bystander of the happy owner.

"It both goes well and returns well," replied the latter. Either of the speakers may have remembered the old admonitory picture which was republished some years ago of Death looking in at a watchmaker's shop, and holding out an hour glass, asking, "Do I go properly?" To which the mechanician tartly replies. "You are much too fast!"

The differences of time have become more remarkable since the electric telegraph has had the transmission of messages. The American story is not a joke, which announced across the continent the accession of a young wife to the honors of motherhood. When the message was read, it was found literally that she had had a son to-morrow. This might happen even in the more limited space of Great Britain. A similar message flashed along the line, let us say five minutes after twelve on a Sunday morning, from Glasgow or Inverness to Plymouth, would reach the latter place at about three-quarters past eleven on Sunday night; the reason, of course, heing that at the first two places time is about seventeen minutes earlier than it is at the last. For the same reason, the new year begins at Liverpool about eleven minutes hefore it does at Bristol. Anyone who has crossed in the Irish mail packets between Holyhead and old Dunleary, as the place was properly called before flunkeyism christened it Kingston. will remember that English time is half an hour hefor Irish time. By forgetting this fact an Irish gentleman once lost his passage; and by being reminded of it he lost his patience and found a grievance.

"English time half an hour before Irish time!" he exclaimed. "And do you call that justice to Ireland?"

The unreasonahle patriot was as confused on the process of time, as if he had been calculating it by the Dutch clock in "Christopher Tadpole," which "pointed to twenty minutes to three, and struck eleven—the combination signifying that it was eight percisely, after the dissolute manner of Dutch clocks in general." These Dntch instruments had certainly a great disregard for the divisions of time. That sixty seconds made a minute, or that sixty minutes made an hour, they agreed or disagreed with, according to caprice and circumstances. And it must be said for them that they were not altogether unreasonable in their capriciousness.

The ordinary idea that sixty minutes make an hour will not hold good in all countries. At the period of the summer solstice in Rome the day is fifteen hours and six minutes iu length, and each hour of the day is really seventy-five minutes long. The night, on the other hand, is actually eight hours and fifty-four minutes long. and each hour consists of forty-four minutes. This is difficult of comprehension to those only who are ignorant of the Italian method of computation of time in the convents, in and about Rome, where the old ecclesiastical fashion survives of dividing the day, from dawn to dewy eve, or dark, into twelve equal parts, and subjecting the night, from dark to dawn, to the same division. This method is cumbersome, blundering, varying and inconvenient; all of which constitute very good reasons for its being retained in that especial locality where little is left of the other world but its errors, vices, pretensions, and superstitions.

THE BOWERY THEATER.

ITS ASSOCIATIONS—TOM HAMBLIN—HIS PERSONAL APPEARANCE AND CHARACTER—MRS. SHAW—SHAKSPEARE AT THE BOWERY—JOHN SCOTT—PANTOMIMES.

WE have hut one really old theater in New York, and that is the well-known Bowery. Niblo's is an old institution, but the building itself is not more than twenty years old. Wallack's, the Broadway, (better known as Wallack's old theater) the Olympic, the Academy, the New York, the French, are all new and almost without associations. But the Bowery has its history, and once boldly rivalled, in its aspirations at least, the sedate and aristocratic Park. Even when old Simpson of the latter establishment used to insist in printing at the top of his bills the simple word "Theater," thereby sublimely ignoring every other institution, the Bowery in its company and its occasional great names, challenged the attention of the public. Malihran sang in it. Charles Kean acted in it. Forrest won on its boards many of his early laurels. Farren, the famous English comedian, made his bow to its audiences. It did not long maintain this position, however, and after a time it became noted for its scenic pieces and the noisy character of hoth its acting and its audiences. That rowdyism which became almost synonymous with the word Bowery soon affected its reputation.

To think of the old Bowery is to recall Tom Hamblin, who for so many years controlled its destinies. To men whose recollections are older than two decades, it is unnecessary to describe Hamblin, and to all others no mere description can adequately convey an impression of a style of man and style of acting now quite passed from the stage. Hamblin was the last of the Kembletonian school. He was Kembletonian in his stature, in his splendid Roman head, in his sonorous utterance, in his stately and grand manner, and in his asthma. He did not miss a point in the traditional characteristics of the great head of the school. There are no men now-a-days huilt upon his model. His stature was large and imposing; his head of the old long type; his features massive, with a nose of the fine Roman cast; his brow compact and small, and his head covered with a mass of clustering locks, thick and heavy, and falling down over the brow in picturesque profusion. It was a head to pick out of ten thousand—not hecause it was intellectual but hecause its type was thoroughly antique. The contrast between him and the modern white-browed, scant-haired, weak-featured, over-refined small-voiced, narrow-chested generation is great indeed. Hamblin's physical beauty, his stately and superh acting, his hold badness, his many wives and the romantic stories current in connection with them, all combined to make him the much talked about. No man's name ever pointed so many morals, or adorned so many tales.

To recall Hamblin is to recall Mrs. Shaw—for hy that name she was better known than hy her husband's (Hamblin), it being quite uncertain when she rightfully lost the one and gained the other. Mrs. Shaw was a great favorite and a great heauty. Her figure was superb, and her face, though rather expressionless, was exceedingly beautiful. Her acting was powerful by a certain magnetic charm it possessed. Her delivery was slow and studied, and she seemed to influence her hearers hy a concentrated intensity, a sort of white heat peculiar to herself. She played Ion iu defiant rivalry with Ellen Tree. The latter's rendition was pure, delicate and intellectual; Mrs. Shaw's was mainly fascinating as the sensuous picture of a superbly beautiful boy—a modern Adonis that drove both men and women wild.

The Bowery stage is large, and offers good scope for scenic pieces. Among its early successes in this way was "The Last Days of Pompeii," with Hamblin as the magnificent Arbaces. At a somewhat later day Putnam and his wonderful ride down the break-neck declivity, offered grand delight for a whole year to the Bowery boys and girls. Some seventeen years ago a strong effort was made to revive the character of the Bowery performances. James W. Wallaok (Jr. then), Lester Wallack, John Gilbert, for a season or two offered the legitimate to only moderately appreciative audiences. The Bowery habitues, however, have always had a liking for Shakspeare. When John Brougham some ten years ago undertook the management of this theater, an examination of the books for the preceding twenty years revealed the fact that, apart from a few long runs of sensational drama, Shakspeare had yielded the best returns, and "Macbeth" had been the favorite. After "Macbeth" came "Hamlet," Hamblin heiug considered then, as Booth is now, the great Hamlet of the day. During the latter days of Hamblin's management, some twenty years ago, when his asthma allowed him to act but rarely, a great favorite, especially with the rougher part of the audiences, was John or Jack Scott. This actor had a fine physique and a most emphatic delivery. The passions were never so roughly handled hy mortal before or since. He used to r-r-roll his r's in a style that would convulse the Bowery boys with wild delight. Intemperance killed him.

These few reminiscenses had been awakened by a visit I paid to the Bowery a few nights ago, the first time for many years. The Bowery is on the east side of the town and quite removed from west-side people's ordinary journeys. The theatre is now under the management of Mr. C. L. Fox, who has exhibited a great deal of talent for pantomime, and whose "Little Boy Blue," etc., have attracted the attention of people not ordinarily counted among the Bowery patrons. I found, as I entered the theatre on the occasion of my visit, the company engaged in acting, as a preliminary to the pantomime, the old society farce "Perfection." I cannot commend the performance. The actors delivered their sentences in a cut and thrust style that was, or would he, horrible to ears polite. The way actors of the Bowery generally have of tossing, churning, and worrying their sentences is utterly indescribable. The audience, however, enjoyed "Perfection" with great relish, laughing and applauding everything that was said or done. The pantomime proved to be really good, Mr. Fox, who is manager, author, and actor, exhibiting no little talent in writing, producing, and acting plays of this character. The transformations and tricks were good, and the merriment they excited abundant. One could not complain of the conduct of the audience, which was noisy only in its good nature. There was a plentiful chewing of peanuts, eating of oranges, and munching of other edibles. Young gentlemen were rather prone to sit with their arms encircling the waists of the fair damsels who accompanied them, and the damsels themselves, in no wise repelling this affectionate demonstration, coddled up closely to the sides of their protectors and seemed to enoy the play all the better in consequence of their snug and agreeable positions. A sweetheart's waist to encircle, an orange for refreshment, and a good play to look at seemed to afford the warm-hearted beaux the extreme of felicity. It was quite amusiug to notice how each good part of the play would be communicated to the fair companion by affectionate hugs. If the loud laughter that greeted the pantomime sometimes betrayed the empty mind, it also gave evidence of the simple heart and the ready disposition to he pleased. Altogether a visit to the Bowery is worth making.—New York Correspondent of the Boston Saturday Evening Gazette

CHEESE AS FOOD.—Compared with other people, the Americans place but little value on cheese as an article of food. We use it as a condiment, sauce or side dish, rather than as necessary or proper food. In England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and in many parts of continental Europe, it is regarded as a common and sometimes a necessary article of food. There is reason why it should be so regarded. Its composition is very similar to that of flesh, the case in representing the muscular fibre, and the buttery matter the fat portion. Casien in an albuminous substance, useful in building up the muscles, and the battery matter is a concentrated carbon as useful, in its way, for food, as fat meat. The Swiss chamois hunters take on their expeditions among the higher Alps, where they remain sometimes for days together, exposed to intense cold and undergoing the hardest of exercise, only a small quantity of cheese and a flask of brandy. The English harvesters live on ale, cheese, bread, and occasionally a hit of mutton. The Germans and Hollanders use cheese as a commou article of food. Cheese derives a factitious and market value from the districts in which it is produced. The Stiltou cheese is a synonym of superior excellence to the English palate, and those who have made themselves acquainted with Teutonic tastes understand well what is meant by Limhurger and Sweitzer kase. But for years past the American cheeses have been growing in favor, not ouly here, but in England. A late number of the London Grocer says: "The Americans and Canadians are emulating our most successful dairymen, and really choice American and Canadian cheese may now be obtained from those English importers who have made themselves well acquainted with the hest sources of supply." If cheese could be afforded at a fair price as compared with meat, there is no reason why it should not become iu a measure, a substitute, as it seems to be especially adapted to restore the force expended by those whose work is extra laborious and exhaustive; and, indeed, it may be questioned, now, whether it is not as cheap, all things considered, as fresh meats. It is a subject worthy some consideration.

POLITENESS IN BUSINESS.—Politeness is a large addition to your capital already invested. It keeps your customers in a good humor, and gains new ones for you every day. It is the charm that smooths and softens the rough paths of business. It is the "philosopher's stone" which turns every hinge you touch into gold. It invests commercial life with the most of the poetry that adorns it. It makes men like you and love to deal with you. It gains you the kind words and good offiecs of those with whom you daily come in contact. It has been humorously and truly said hy one that he preferred making his yearly hill with a polite merchant who would cheat him a little, than a rude, rough, and habitually impolite one who would honest him a great deal. Honesty and honor are commendable and shining qualities, it is true, hut they never look better than when they are found in a setting of genuine politeness and good breeding.

THERE is very little charity or benevolence in a deed if the doer thinks there is a great deal

THE PROSPECTS OF THE CHURCH OF ROME.

To one measurably free from the prejudices of sect, and who surveys the history and the present position of the Roman Catholic Church from the stand-point of an independent and philosophical observer, it seems difficult to discover any sufficient grounds for the wide-spread and confident belief that exists even among the better informed and thoughtful classes outside of her communion, that Church is in a decadent condition, and is soon destined to lose the vast power which it has exercised in the world during more than fourteen centuries.

It is almost equally difficult to comprehend how any intelligent and liberal believer in Christianity, who wishes the influence of religion to be powerfully felt in society, literature, and politics, can regard the speedy overthrow or decay of the Church of Rome as a thing to be desired.

So far as the prospect of such an event is concerned, we can discover nothing either in the latest aspect and tendencies of religious and philosophical thought, or in the present condition of society, or in recent political events in Europe, to make it seem probable. The fact that it at least holds its own in the most enlightened and highly civilized European communities, and in the great centers of learning, would seem to show in opposition to the popular Protestant notion, that it can exist and flourish in an atmosphere of the ripest culture, and the brightest intelligence: the vast number of men, eminent for high ability and profound scholarship, in England, France, and Germany, who are its earnest champions, negatives the idea that it can, in this progressive and sceptical age, command the honest allegiance of none but the ignorant or the superstitious; and its present condition and attitude in the United States prove with equal conclusiveness unsoundness the old-fashioned Protestant conviction that it must dwindle and perish when brought into contact with free institutions, public schools, an untrammelled press, and the thousand influences of American society that were deemed peculiarly hostile to superstition and priestcraft.

Those who have heretofore entertained these ideas, must have begun to perceive the necessity of reconsidering them, when they note the increasing influence of the Roman Catholic Church in a country where it receives no aid or countenance from the State, and where its doctrines and practices are amenable to the freest criticism and discussion.

As to the effect upon the Church, likely to be produced by depriving the Pope of his status as a temporal prince, we can see no reason for believing that it will be injurious to its power. It might indeed give an increased importance to the various national churches as bodies to a certain extent independent, and so assimilate their relations to each other to those that exist between the Episcopal Church in England and that in the United States; but this would, it seems to us, prove an additional source of strength, rather than an injury.

If we come to the question of the desirableness of the speedy overthrow of Roman Catholicism, we must remember that there are many populous communities where it is the only form in which Christianity exists or has any hold upon the people. In Italy and Spain there is but one church, and that church is in those countries the only representative of Christianity. The same may be affirmed, though less broadly, of Austria and France. The overthrow of the Catholic Church in those countries would mean nothing less than the overthrow of religion itself, and the inauguration of that low infidelity which is more detestable than the most distorted and corrupt forms that Romanism has ever assumed—such infidelity as in the days of the first French Revolution, caused even an infidel legislature to contemplate its manifestations with horror, and to seek the restoration of religious belief as the only means of saving the State from monarchy, and society from utter demoralization. When the alternative is between such infidelity as made the Parisian mob act at one time like beasts, and at another like demons, and Romanism as it exists even in Spain or South America, no candid believer in Christianity, however strong his Protestant prejudices, will long hesitate in his decision. No thoughtful student of history can deny that the Roman Catholic Church has done, and is still doing a great and good work in the world, however much his antagonism may be aroused by the unbounded assumption and the haughty intolerance that have been her most invariable characteristics. Notwithstanding the consistent cruelty of her her system, and the logical arrogance of her pretentions, she is a great and powerful branch of the Church Universal, in whose downfall no enlightened Christian would exult however much he may deplore the abuses and corruptions which she has sanctioned.

Such an event, therefore, we regard as one not to be reasonably anticipated for at least many generations, and not to be desired until the way is prepared and the foundation laid for some future Church, such as might grow out of a union or eclecticism of all the best elements of the Greek, Roman, and Protestant communions. The establishment of ecclesiastical relations between the Episcopal Church and the Church of Russia, which has been advocated by Anglican divines, and was discussed at the last Episcopal General Convention, of the United States, may prove the first step in this direction. Meantime, we are very far from indulging any expectations that either this, or the next generation will witness the consummation of any such great eclectic scheme as is above alluded to.

THE ALUMNI CELEBRATION.

The Fourth Annual meeting of the Associated Alumni of the Pacific coast took place on the 5th instant, at Oakland. The Literary exercises on the occasion consisted of an oration, by the Rev. Dr. Stone, and a poem by Frank Bret Harte, Esq. The poem was something quite new, and so far as our knowledge extends, entirely unprecedented in its kind, being a really true and artistic poem written for an anniversary occasion. If there is anything in the same line extant, we have not had the good fortune to meet with it. The only suggestions that the most malicious criticism could originate in regard to it would be that it has no special appropriateness to an Alumni gathering, and that there are certain reminiscenses of Longfellow's "Building of the Ship," distinguishable at times in the rhythm and metre. The social gathering in the evening passed off very pleasantly. Among the best of the speeches on the occasion, were that of W. H. L. Barnes, which opened very gracefully in a serious and pensive vein, with a backward glance at college reminiscenees, and closed in a strain of robust humor; that of Mr. Bartlett, of the Bulletin, which was sensible, vigorous, and manly, and that of Professor Keeler, which was the neatest, the most artistic—and we suspect the most carefully prepared—of all.

"Mark Twain" and Mr. Webb.—The Brooklyn Eagle thinks that Charles Henry Webb, and "Mark Twain," are one and the same person. In a late issue it has the following:

"Mark Twain—Charles H. Webb—has been known on the Pacific coast for a number of years by his humorous, philosophical, and satirical contributions to the California press. His introduction to the reading public of the Atlantic States occurred in the columns of the New York Times, through "Liffith Lank," one of the cleverest travesties that has appeared in a long time."

We are in doubt whether "Mark," or Mr. Webb will feel most flattered by this odd blunder. Both will, we suspect, be inclined to the opinion that the Eagle is not as well informed as it ought to be, in regard to the literary celebrities of the day.

The New York Weekly Review makes favorable mention of a picture exhibited at the last exhibition of the National Academy of Design, called "On the Grand Canal, Venice," which is, we believe, the work of David D. Neal, a young California artist, well known in this city. The Review says: "It is an indisputably fine painting of its class. It is a view taken from an open balcony or room looking over and upon the line of the canal. The landscape, or, more properly, the waterscape, is deliciously rendered with a sedulous finish which, if less artistic, might haply be Pre-Raphaelite. Nothing could well be more charming than the color, and if an exception be taken to the figures of the Venetian woman and child, it is simply that they are not equal in their treatment to the rest of this most excellent work."

Italian Opera.—The new season of Italian Opera will commence at the Academy of Music on Wednesday, June 13th. The troupe have been assiduously rehearsing the following operas during the present week: Faust, Linda di Chamounix, Macbeth and Rigoletto, as well as the famous opera of L'Africanine, and the opera of Ione, which are new to San Francisco. This season promises to be the most attractive ever given in this city and subscriptions should come in rapidly. The box-sheet for subscribers' seats will be open every morning at 10 o'clock. On Monday, the grand opera of Ione will be rehearsed, the theatre being closed to the public for the occasion. The new season will open with the fine opera of Faust.

Both the New York Tribune and the Herald speak in very high terms of eulogy, of "Mark Twain's" lecture, at the Cooper Institute. The Herald declares that "the mantle of 'Artemus Ward' has fallen upon 'Mark's' shoulders," and the Tribune awards him a distinguished place among American humorists. The lecture was on the Sandwich Islands, being the same delivered at the Academy of Music before the lecturer's departure for the East, and it seems to have proved a complete success

GLIMPSES OF BOHEMIA.

BY AN OLD STAGER.

A LUNCH AT "THE SHADES"—I MAKE THE PERSONAL ACQUAINTANCE OF MR C. COLUMBUS TOTTLE, OF THE "SUNDAY GLOBE," AND MR. HAMPDEN FLIGHTLEY, OF THE "WEEKLY SCISSORS."

My friend's apparel consisted of a well-worn black frock coat, threadbare in places, and particularly shiny about the cuffs and collar, but carefully brushed; an alpacca vest by no means new; and trowsers of some cheap stuff for summer wear, all however, well made and fitting admirably. His boots, shirt, and cravat were unexceptionable; and in spite of all deficiencies of detail, there was a certain unmistakable air of style and fashion about his appearance as a whole.

Utterly unembarrassed by the meanness of his surroundings, he offered me the only chair the room contained and seated himself in one of the depressions in the demoralized lounge, saying;

"I never ask a visitor to occupy this luxurious article of furniture, unless he is an unwelcome one, or has learned by experience where he may locate himself safely. One must know where the springs are, or its dangerous. And now my dear boy, tell me what on earth has brought you to New York, and how you come to be away from the venerable Alpha out of vacation time." Though I had sought him out for the express purpose of telling him what he now asked, I found myself unable to do it. A revulsion of feeling which I could not account for had suddenly come over me, and for the moment I saw or suspected something of the monstrous folly of my scheme. I told him that I had left college—but not why, and gave him to understand that I had come to the city for a week's recreation.

After a few minutes' conversation referring mainly to matters and persons connected with the college, my companion excused himself in order to "step out and learn the time of day."

"My neighbor," he said, "the occupant of the next room is the wealthy proprietor of a wooden clock, which I have in vain endeavored to persuade him to put up in the hall for the common benefit of the tenants of this floor, and I revenge myself for his meanness in refusing to do so, by going in to demand the time as often as I can make it convenient."

Within a minute he returned. "It is lunch time," he said, "that is, it is what we used to call dinner-time at Schenectady; and if you retain a college appetite, I have no doubt you can do justice to a mutton chop and a glass of beer."

"Lunch," was a meal that I had never before heard of. At H——, and also at Schenectady, even the most fashionable people breakfasted at from six to seven in Summer, and from seven to eight in Winter; dined at twelve or one, and "took tea," (a meal consisting of bread and butter, cake, preserves, and tea, but with no meats or cooked dishes,) at "candle-light."

Locking his door, and depositing they ke in its place of concealment between the coal-box and the wall, my friend led the way down stairs, and drawing my arm through his, conducted me through Wall street to Broadway, crossed to the west side, and dived into a narrow street or alley leading toward the North River. After walking half a block, we reached a mean looking frame building with the name "The Shades" over the door.

"This is an English institution," said Pike, "but inasmuch as they keep a superior article of ale, and the very best of chops and steaks, besides being reasonable in the matter of charges, I waive the point of patriotism and generally take my lunch here." Entering the street door, we found ourselves in a narrow passage, and turning to the right passed into a long room where a few persons were lunching, or drinking ale at small wooden tables, of which there was a row separated by short intervals, on each side of the apartment. The floor was sprinkled with fresh sawdust, and the walls were adorned with a variety of sporting cuts, of famous pugilists, actors, race-horses, together with spirited and life-like portraits of celebrated terriers, some of whom had been victorious over other celebrated terriers in matches for from fifty to five hundred dollars a side, and some of whom enjoyed an honorable fame in consequence of the number of rats they were recorded to have dispatched in sixty seconds.

As we seated ourselves at one of the tables, a waiter rushed forward to take our order. It was very evident that my friend was regarded as a person of no ordinary consequence in this establishment, and the deference shown him, went a great way toward neutralizing the impression made upon my mind by the wretched and poverty-stricken appearance of his "office and lodgings."

A thick-set man with a protruding mouth, and a nose the symmetry of which seemed to have been permanently impaired by some accident not of a very recent date, was sitting in a square closet or box behind a bar just long enough to occupy the width of the door-way, where he drew the ale as it was ordered of the boy who waited on the customers.

We were scarcely seated when two young men entered the room, who saluted my companion in a somewhat boisterous fashion, and without an invitation drew a couple of chairs to the table occupied by us, which furnished but scanty accommodations for four persons. Pike did not appear, as it seemed to me, to be particularly pleased at this unexpected accession to the company; but seeming to place some constraint upon himself, he performed the ceremony of introducing me to them, as Mr. Tottle, and Mr. Flightley. The former gentleman, I think I should have had no difficulty in recognizing, from my friend's epistolary description. He was a brisk, alert, breezy-looking little man, of about five and twenty, with a peculiarly wide-awake and complacent expression of countenance, and a carriage so erect and military as to suggest the notion that he was bent on making up by the dignity of his port, for his defective stature. Mr. Flightley, on the other hand, was tall and slender, with large dark eyes, an abundance of silky hair, and a mildly sentimental expression of countenance.

"Lunching, eh?" said Mr. Tottle, as the attendant placed before us the mutton chops and the two "tobeys of ale" that Pike had ordered. "Flightley and I, just came round for a little chat over a glass of liquid refreshment; breakfasted late, and won't want any solids until dinner time. What shall it be Flightley, eh? What do you say to a bottle of Scotch ale at joint expense—a Kentucky treat, eh?"

Mr. Flightley assented to this suggestion, remarking that he didn't approve of Kentucky treats as a general thing, or of that style of partnership arrangement on social and festive occasions, unless financial considerations rendered it an imperative necessity. It wasn't exactly the romantic style, but then what was a man to do when the state of his exchequer laid a veto upon the impulses of a convivial spirit?" Accordingly the bottle of ale being brought, each of the two gentlemen produced a shilling, in payment of his half of the treat, and Mr. Tottle placed the two coins in the hand of the attendant.

"By-the-by Pike," said the gentleman last named, after tossing off his first glass of ale, "the Majesty of Mango has promulgated an edict changing the place of meeting for to-night, from the old Symposium to Rheinstein's cellar—you know the place—on Broome street not far from Mott."

"Yes, I know the place" returned Pike, rather tartly, "and the lager too, which is new, yeasty, and detestable. What the deuce is the change for?"

"Why, Rex says that the weather is too hot to drink lager, and I suspect he means to put us on sour 'Rhein wein' or 'Berliner Weiss-bier' or some such trashy stuff during the heated term. He gives out that he has struck something particularly rich in the way of a hot weather drink, at the Broome street cellar."

"It's what I call a high-handed thing," grumbled Mr. Flightley with a solemn and injured air, "a piece of confounded tyranny. His encroachments upon the Constitution have gone the length of establishing an absolute despotism. We have no law but his whims, and they are becoming more outrageous every day.

"Ah!" exclaimed Mr. Tottle, with a countenance expressive of thoughtful admiration, "he does carry things with a high hand. But then he does it everywhere, and with everybody. I never knew such a man to have his own way. Why, he comes sauntering into our office just as if he owned it, and marches right into old Bullhead's sanctum when he's in such a mood that I'd rather go into the cage of the laughing hyena at the Bowery Menagerie. There isn't a weekly paper in town, and not a great many dailies either, where he don't make himself just as free as a Fifth Ward Statesman at a corner grocery on election day. What does he care for 'Private,' or 'No Admittance' on a door? Why it only seems to provoke him, and in he's sure to march, just as old Pastebucket makes it a matter of religious principle to slap up a six-foot poster wherever he sees a notification to 'Post No Bills.' Its wonderful," resumed Mr. Tottle after a pause, during which he refreshed himself with another glass of ale, "Its wonderful, and so far as I am concerned, I'm free to say I can't analyze it. I've sat for hours trying to analyze it, and I think I may, without vanity, lay claim to some analalytical faculty—at least I had credit for it at college, standing second in mathematics out of a class of sixty; but really I've given it up long ago."

"It's magnetism," said Mr. Flightley, looking very profound. "It's just personal magnetism—and that's the whole of it;" having delivered himself of this oracular utterance, he recommenced drinking with a didactic air.

Mr. Tottle, however, did not seem inclined to accept this off-hand solution of a problem that had so long baffled his analytical powers, and he rejoined, with some asperity:

"O, that's your explanation is it! Well, it may be satisfactory to you, but it will hardly satisfy anyone who likes to look into things. It's plausible enough; but it isn't philosophical. It is easy enough to say 'personal magnetism,' but I'd like to be told, if it's quite convenient, what that personal magnetism consists of."

"What does it consist of? O, that's your difficulty is it?" said Mr. Flightley, with an odd mixture of wisdom, sternness, and condescension in his air, "Well, then, it consists in——"

Here the speaker suddenly slapped himself on the face, and pronounced an animated anathema upon an imaginary fly, after which he wiped his forehead with his handkerchief, transferred the remaining contents of the bottle in which he and his friend were jointly interested, to his own glass, and drank with much deliberation.

Mr. Tottle was not so completely absorbed in any analytical process as not to observe this act of unequal appropriation, and there was something that savored of high moral disapprobation in his tone and manner, as he brought Mr. Flightley back to the point:

"I believe you were going to inform me what it consists of. I should like to hear, for I confess it's too much for me to make out without assistance."

"Pshaw!" interrupted Pike, impatiently, "there's nothing so mysterious about the matter. Grandin is a handsome, high-spirited young fellow, overflowing with talent and vitality, and possessing a fascinating address and a distinguished air. That's the whole secret of his ascendency over the vulgar."

"Excuse me," said Mr. Tottle, with dignity. "Flightley was on the point of explaining, I believe. I should be pleased to hear his explanation."

"Well now," returned the gentleman last named, "its most extraordinary; but Pike has fairly taken the words out of my mouth. What I meant by magnetism—personal magnetism, is simply the overflow—the surplus—the superabundance—the exhuberance of vitality, and all that sort of thing, substantially as Pike has expressed it. Pike understands the thing precisely as I do. And really, Tottle, you know you oughtn't to set a thing down as inscrutable, because you can't see into it."

This concluding observation was pronounced "offensive" by Tottle, and elicited from that gentleman a retort in kind, to which his adversary rejoined in the same vein of delicate sarcasm; whereupon Mr. Tottle surrejoined with increasing bitterness, and the discussion was fast waxing hot and fierce, when Pike put an end to it by saying:

"This won't do. It's personal, and comes under Article Five. Stop it! Another word, and it will be bottled ale at the next meeting."

These words produced a magical effect. Both disputants looked seriously frightened, and not without good reason, as I afterward understood.

"I'm sure I'm as much opposed to serious discussions in public places," said Mr. Tottle, in a deprecatory tone, "as any gentleman can be. It's in bad taste, and if there's any one thing that I'm more opposed to than another, by instinct, education, and temperament, that thing is bad taste. I'd rather violate the code of morality," continued the little man impressively, and emphasizing his words by a blow of his fist upon the table—"I'd rather violate the code of morality, than the code of taste; it's more gentlemanly. The former is only a sin, the latter is a vulgarity." Having given utterance to these exalted sentiments with an amazing fluency of speech, he shook hands with Mr. Flightley, and declared that he had meant nothing offensive in calling that gentleman "dogmatic;" dogmatism after all was merely one of the forms in which confidence in one's own convictions exhibited itself; it was often an attribute of the greatest intellects and associated with prodigious learning. Of all which Mr. Tottle proceeded to give numerous instances, including Dr. Johnson, Porson, and other famous men.

Then Mr. Flightley, thoroughly appeased, declared that he had meant nothing offensive, when he had called Mr. Tottle "voluble." Indeed the charge might generally be considered a compliment rather than otherwise. Volubility was akin to eloquence, and it was often used by the envious as a disparaging term for that ease and fluency of expression which they did not themselves possess. In fact, he, Mr. Flightley had been more than once so disparaged, by disputants who had found themselves unable to hold their own with him in discussion.

To say the truth, neither gentleman seemed to have much the advantage so far as the unfailing flow of words was concerned, the chief difference being that while Mr. Tottle's style of speech was like the rattle of rain-drops upon dry leaves in a brisk shower, or the continuous fire of squibs, Mr. Flightley's discourse flowed on in a steady monotone as unbroken and unvaried as the sound of water running from a spigot. The former liked to hear himself talk, and seemed to concern himself little whether any one listened; while the latter was jealous of inattention and intolerant of interruption, eyeing his audience closely as he talked, and looking utterly disgusted whenever he detected a straying glance or a side remark.

The reader will be able to judge how utterly unsophisticated, or how deficient in natural acuteness I must have been, when I state in all sincerity, that I was quite blind to anything comic or absurd in all this. On the contrary, I looked up to Messrs Tottle and Flightley as two decidedly superior literary persons, and was impressed with a profound admiration both for their ability, and their amiability.

Harmony having been restored, Mr. Tottle proposed that the company should adjourn to the "Rarebit" and "take a mug of ale all round" at his expense, adding as he glanced toward the empty "Tobies," that he "relished it better out of pewter." The "toby," it may be as well to explain, since I have never seen it except in certain old-fashioned places, in the city of New York, is an earthern-ware mug holding about a pint, and having a handle and a lip like a pitcher. The side opposite the handle is distended like an alderman's stomach, and represents a grotesque countenance, expressive of the highest stage of convivial jollity. It was used only for English ale, and was considered by moderate or inexperienced drinkers to hold enough for two persons. The liquor was always poured from the mug into small and slender glasses preparatory to drinking.

"Nonsense!" returned Pike in answer to Mr. Tottle's proposal, smiling oddly as he spoke, "that notion about pewter is a mere fancy. We'll take it here, in the shape of two tobies, which will give us a couple of glasses apiece, and cost the same as four mugs of Alabany." So saying he rapped on the table to summon the attendant, whereupon Mr. Tottle manifesting symptoms of demoralizing alarm, hastily declared that he had another reason for his proposition to adjourn, besides his predilection for pewter, namely, that he enjoyed an established credit at the "Rarebit" upon which he designed to draw, not having at present, as he expressed it, "a copper about him."

Pike, seeming by no means astonished at this revelation of impecuniosity, ordered the two tobies, and fishing a couple of six-pences from his waistcoat pocket paid for the liquor himself. Thereupon Mr. Tottle whose spirits had seemed momentarily depressed, became himself again, and recommenced talking with great vivacity, sipping his ale at intervals with as much apparent gusto as though it were "out of pewter."

Mr. Flightley, meanwhile, appropriated one of the mugs to himself and me jointly, perceiving, perhaps, that I drank sparingly, and preferring me on that account as a partner.

"Do you ever see my paper, the Scissors, Mr. Flicker?" he inquired politely as he filled my glass and his own. I explained that I lived in the country, this being my first visit to the city, which might, I said, account for my never having heard of the journal referred to.

"Indeed!" said he, smiling with an expression of pity rather than of surprise. "Well, the fact is, we don't circulate much in the rural districts, and don't care to. What we play for, is a circulation among the cultivated and aristocratic classes. We leave the 'oi polloi' (Mr. Flightley pronounced the words without the aspirate.) to the Dredger and the Globe and that class of flash Sunday papers."

This allusion to the two Sunday publications was uttered in a very low tone, and accompanied by a furtive glance at Pike and Tottle, who were engaged in an animated discussion, the question seeming to be whether one Gushling ought to be expelled from the Mangoes for having "degraded the profession"—such was Mr. Tottle's charge—"by doing the theatricals" on some weekly journal, at five shillings per week.

"Yes sir," resumed my new acquaintance, upon noting the preoccupation of our companions, "we don't get up the Scissors with reference to the tastes of sewing girls, fire boys, and sporting characters. We have a small but select metropolitan circulation, among classes who would feel it necessary to make their ablutions with an extra-liberal use of soap, and to sprinkle themselves with eau de cologne, should they chance to take up such a journal as ——." Here the speaker suddenly paused, and, glancing up, I perceived that Mr. Tottle had his eye fixed upon him sternly, smiling a sardonic smile. Flightley had already perceived it, and swallowing a glass of ale, with great presence of mind concluded the sentence—"as the Venus Miscellany or the Police Gazette,"

"Ha! ha! ha!" laughed Mr. Tottle, "Ha! ha! ha!"

"What's the matter with you, Tottle?" asked Mr. Flightley, pouring the remaining contents of the toby into his glass. "Don't keep the joke to yourself pray."

"If the courage of some people," returned Mr. Tottle significantly, "only equalled their superciliousness and malignity, "they'd speak out plain, and not swallow their words just between their teeth and their lips. That's the joke Flightley. How do you like it," retorted Tottle glaring viciously at his friend.

"I don't understand you," returned the other with dignity, "really I'm afraid that the tipple's too strong for you."

"O no, you don't understand me. Of course not," retorted Mr. Tottle, "well then, let me say that I understand you perfectly, sir. And I'll take the liberty of telling you, sir, in the presence of witnesses, that I consider even the Venus Miscellany and the Police Gazette immeasurably superior to a paper that lives upon stealing—a paper, sir that depends more upon "scissors" than brains; that clips its matter from exchanges with a pair of shears, throws it in with a pitchfork, and publishes it without credit. The Venus Miscellany and the Police Gazette, have individuality and character of their own at least. They are distinctive; they occupy a field, sir. Their matter is original. Can the same be said of the Weekly Scissors?"

"Don't go too far, Tottle," said Mr. Flightley, emphasizing the caution with his fore-finger; "don't presume too much upon old acquaintance and your diminutive stature, for there's a point you know where—"

But the irascible Tottle anticipated his opponent, in reaching "the point where forbearance ceases to be a virtue." The allusion to his stature was scarcely out of Mr. Flightley's mouth, when he seized the toby, in which half a glass of ale yet remained, and threw the contents into that gentleman's face.

This sudden change in the manner of conducting the discussion seemed to take Mr. Flightley entirely by surprise. For several seconds he sat regarding his adversary with a bewildered air, the ale dripping from his beard upon his shirt-bosom. Then rising from his chair, he hoarsely articulated the words; "We shall meet again," and stalked solemnly from the room.

FENIAN FACTS.

"DON'T drink that water, sir; it's full of Feeneens," said the aged and feeble sextoness of our parish church to my little son, one sultry Sunday in August, 1865. "Feeneens!" replied I. "Pray what on earth are Feeneens?" I poured out some of the condemned water into a tumbler. It was bright and clear, but swarmed with a multitude of black, wriggling, doubling, worm-like insects, darting to and fro in every hideous variety of form. "These, then, are Feeneens?" said I. "Ugly creatures they are at best."

Next day, looking at a stack of clover, I saw all round the base of the rick a layer of impalpable dust, of a light yellow color, like the pollen of flowers. "What is this?" I inquired of James Fitzpatrick, the factotum who managed my little farm. "That's the Feeneens," he answered; "they ate up all the good of the clover-seed, and lave that dirty stuff behind them." So I concluded that the word "Feeneens," or, as it is usually pronounced in Ireland, "Feenyeens," denoted a multitude of any ugly devouring creatures which destroyed what was intended for the use of man and beast. It has been supposed that the word is derived from some mythical Irish king called Fin, or Finn, or from a Celtic root signifying "chivalry" or "militia," but whenever I heard of the Fenians afterwards I could not help remembering the creatures who spoiled the bright water and my clover-stack.

It was in August and September, 1865, that the existence of biped Fenians first became experimentally known to me. Afternoon services were held on Sundays in the parish church, at four P. M. These services were much more largely and fashionably attended than those in the morning. A walk through the country lanes and by the fields, teeming with harvest, was delightful. The officers from a neighboring garrison seemed to think that an hour's sojourn in a pretty neatly furnished church gave a pleasant rest, if nothing more. The afternoon services were semi-choral, and the preacher, a clergyman of high collegiate reputation, thought he could say as much in fifteen minutes as his hearers would be likely to retain.

My way to the church lay through a long avenue, bordered with ornamental firs and flowering shrubs, all alive with singing birds. The roadway then passed under and between two great sepulchral mounds or "barrows," supposed to have been raised by the Danes over dead warriors. A square patch of grass, darker in hue than the rest, indicated where an exploration had been made, and the country people told how deep within the mound the diggers reached a stone chamber, and saw for a moment a war-horse and his rider in armour, stiff and erect. While they looked upon the figures, they said, man and horse crumbled away, and all they found were plates of rusty armour, broken fragments of golden ornaments, swords eaten away by time and damp, and dusty bones of the chieftain and his charger. From these mounds the road is bordered with wild apple, hazel, and hawthorn trees. In spring the banks are blue with perfumed violets, or yellow with primroses. The country girls and their sweethearts love to sit upon these mossy banks in summer evening, and plan the future of their lives. Down the hill a sudden turn leads to a long reach of roadway, and now the beautiful church spire gleams white above a thick grove of beech, and fir, and aged laurels. It was on this road, and amidst its peaceful scenery, I first fell in with the "Fenian men."

On the third Sunday in August, 1865, passing as usual in my little pony-car under the barrows I spoke of, I observed far over my head, in strong relief, as fine a specimen of humanity as I ever saw. He stood perfectly motionless, looking intently down the long roadway. I bade the man, as usual, "the time of day," but met with no reply. This was curious, for the Irish peasantry are probably the most polite and courteous in the world. "He must be a stranger," thought I, and again hailed him. Suddenly glancing down upon me for a moment, the man lifted both hands above his head, ran three times round the summit of the barrow, and disappeared on the opposite side. I knew enough of the military system to be assured that the man was a scout or advanced picket, and that he had just signalled the presence of a stranger to others. Looking behind me, down in the valley, I perceived three dark bands of men, each band containing about sixty. Some twenty yards in front stood a single individual, facing the rest. There could be no doubt these men were at drill in that fern-clad hollow among the hills. Pursuing my way to church, I suddenly, at the turn of the road, came upon a Fenian regiment, marching, I suppose, to join the men at drill. The scout had warned them, for they were partly breaking up from close order; but it was plain they were divided into advanced guard, main body, and rear guard. They opened out without a word to let my pony pass, and fell in on each side of the railway, so as to prove to me they had been at least partly drilled. They were dressed very comfortably and even neatly. All wore the American "pot hat," dark-grey cloth blouses, dark grey trousers, and all, without exception, were well shod. A finer or more healthy and cleanly looking body of young men no one could wish to see. They were just the material for soldiers. Evidently they were farmers' sons, or from the better class of laborers. Not one among them was over twenty-five years, or younger than eighteen. As I passed down between the double line, very slowly, anxious to recognise some face I knew, I saw they were all strangers from other parishes. There was not one of the residents in our own district amongst them, and it was subsequently discovered that the Fenians of one parish always marched and drilled in another. Here and there amongst them a hand would be doubtfully, and with some hesitation, moved to the hat, by way of salutation. One or two gave me the regular military salute. I touched my hat, and wished "good evening" to all, but they were not in a social mood. About the center of the line one carried a flag-pole, but no flag; another strove to play an Irish jig upon a squeaking fife. There was not one of woman-kind either amongst or following the company—a most unusual thing in Ireland. This was no meeting for a dance upon the short springy sheep-shorn grass; it was the "March of the Fenian men."

From that time, until the seizure of the Irish People newspaper, late in September, and the capture of James Stephens subsequently, a feeling of worrying and wearying uneasiness universally prevailed. People spoke loudly of "confidence" and "loyalty," but they sought for confirmation of this trust, and betrayed, unconsciously, their own apprehension. Drilling was constantly carried on, but never twice in the same place, and this proved how general and effective was the organization. A signal fire kindled on one of the neighboring hills was answered from other hills in quick succession. These fires did not blaze out for more than ten or fifteen minutes, and probably were kindled with straw or furze. Fire baloons were now and then seen to rise from the distant coast and soar above the hills, then to flash out redly and disappear. We passed, on four successive evenings, through large bodies of men who made way for us silently, and gave no greeting. Now, however, they had with them a fiddler or a piper, or they flung a football into the air on the approach of strangers.

No injury was committed on property, except that the young ash-trees were cut down and carried off, no one could find whither. We heard the dull thud of axes, and the sharp short crack of breaking timber in our own wood toward the early hours of morning. Our dogs often barked furiously at night, and when let loose limped home, lamed or otherwise injured. Twice we found straight branches of seasoned fir cut down and left behind—just the length for pike staves when barked and trimmed.

No one knew whom to trust; your gatekeeper or farm-servant might be in the plot, biding his time, or giving information of your absence. It is now ascertained that the insurgents knew what arms every gentleman possessed, and where he kept them. Cadgers, tramps, and beggars swarmed about the lodges and houses of the gentry. Pedlars, umbrellamenders, clock doctors, and itinerant musicians, all strangers, endeavored to gain entrance to the farm-yards and kitchens unobserved by the owner of the mansion or his family. They had always stories of the American war to tell, and spoke of an American expedition to Ireland as a settled thing. They cleverly, and in the most artful way, inquired respecting the habits of the family and their friends. Scarcely a day passed without a visit from persons evidently Americans, with a horse and gig. They dashed up the avenue, and insisted upon exhibiting to the "ladies" of the household shawls, laces, patterns of cloths, stuffs, and tweeds, as salvage from imaginary wrecks. While one engaged the attention of the inmates, the other examined the approaches to the house and out-offices. I detected one of these fellows sketching a plan of the rectory-house, a place memorable for the repulse of a rebel attack in "'98." He had jotted down carefully the bearings of a road through a defile, and under a "rath," or barrow, close to the house. Ladies feared to walk in their own grounds without male protection, and our dogs were admitted to pleasure-gardens from which before they had been rigidly excluded. Strangers came in, we could not tell from whence or how—whether through hedges and over fences, or by the lodge gates with the connivance of the keeper. To lock the gates was no effectual means to keep them out. They seemed to know all the "gaps" and "short cuts" about the farm. Occasionally the lodge people said they were threatened with violence if they did not allow the tramps to pass. It was a time of vague fear and general insecurity. Several of our leading families left for Dublin or large towns, the gentleman returning to guard their homes or advise their tenantry. The constabulary patrolled the public roads, and passed through demesnes all the night through in bodies of six or eight or ten, but they could not be everywhere. The very precautions taken to prevent alarm created apprehension. Nothing of value was ever taken. The oats, wheat, hay, and potatoes remained safe and untouched in farm-yard or field. Yet every night there was an alarm, often, as it seemed, unfounded. One night we thought the hour of rising had actually come, for fires flared up here and there in our wood and plantation; we heard the tramp of feet and voices of men. In the morning we were told "the bird-catchers were here last night," and kindled straw to daze and bewilder the wood guests."

It might be true or false, for no one desired by minute inquiries to show he distrusted those about him. But the rope which daily hauled up our Union Jack was cut and taken away, our young ash-trees were carried off, our dogs were maltreated, and our cattle came galloping from the fields to the homestead in the dead of the night. This undecided worry continued until the latter end of October, when the police were making numerous arrests. The seizure of the Irish People and the leading conspirators had baffled the plans for insurrection. Drilling ceased, and we met no more of those bands of silent men, while our nights were passed without disturbance or alarm. But numbers of young men, laborers or farm-servants, suddenly disappeared. They had departed for America; but how they obtained the passage-money I could not ascertain. Many a sorrowing mother has since come to me to "write a line" for her to her son at New York or Chicago, who seemed to have forgotton "her and the old home." In the autum of 1866, only two attempts were made, to our knowledge, to recommence drilling and marching. But the numbers present were greatly diminished, and the "Fenians" were plainly of the very lowest grade. The constabulary seemed to think that the danger was greater than in the preceding year, but we saw no reason to believe such was the case. We supposed that if a rising was really intended, it would take place when the harvest was gathered in, and before the farmer sold his produce to pay his November gale.

Nothing calculated to excite apprehension occurred; the peasants pursued their usual avocations, there was almost a total cessation of tippling and drunkenness, and there was little or no crime. The people did not like to speak of the Fenians. The few whom you could draw out condemned and cursed them as robbers, who would pillage the poor farmers first, and who were under the ban of priest and minister.

The autumn had passed away, and Christmas was at hand without a ripple of trouble on the surface of our society, when suddenly we were shocked and alarmed by the discovery that we at least had been sleeping over a mine, and that a trusted man in my own service was suspected to be one of the chief leaders of rebellion. It was for him I sought in vain at Tallaght.—All the Year Round.

POLAR BEAR.—The bears, wandering continually through the night, must needs have a hard struggle to live. During the summer the seals, which furnish their subsistence, crawl up on the ice, and are there easily caught; but in the winter they are captured with difficulty. Driven to desperation by hunger, the bears will sometimes invade the haunts of men in search of the food which their quick sense has detected. I had an adventure about this time, which shows that the Polar bear is not so ferocious as is generally supposed; indeed, they have never been known to attack man, except when hotly pursued and driven to close quarters. Strolling one day along the shore, I was observing with much interest the effect of the recent spring tides upon the ice-foot, when, rounding a point of land, I suddenly found myself confronted in the faint moonlight by an enormous bear. He had just sprung down from the land ice, and was meeting me at a full trot. We caught sight of each other at the same instant. Being without a rifle or other means of defence, I wheeled suddenly toward the ship with, I fancy, much the same reflections about discretion and valor as those which crossed the mind of old Jack Falstaff when the Douglas set upon him; but finding, after a few lengthy strides, that I was not gobbled up, I looked back over my shoulder, when, as much to my surprise as gratification, I saw the bear tearing away toward the open water with a celerity which left no doubt as to the state of his mind. I suppose it would be difficult to determine which was the most frightened—the bear or I.—Dr. Hayes.

AN EXCELLENT THOUGHT.—Whenever we behold a tear, let our kindliest sympathies awake— let it have a sacred claim upon all that we can do to succor and comfort under affliction. What rivers of tears have flown, excited by the cruel and perverse ways of man! War has spread its carnage and desolation, and the eyes of the widows and orphans have been suffused with tears. Intemperance has blighted the homes of millions, and weeping and wailing have been incessant. A thousand other evils, which we may conquer, have given birth to tears enough to constitute a flood—a great tide of grief. Suppose we prize this little philosophy, and each one determine never to excite a tear in another. Watching the eye as the telegraph of the mind within, let us observe it with anxious regard, and whenever we are moved to complaint by the existence of supposed or real wrongs, let the indication of the coming tear be held as a sacred truce to unkindly feeling, and our efforts be devoted to the substitution of smiles for tears.

OUR AUGUSTAN AGE.—The New York Citizen says: "The last half-century has been the brightest period of English fiction; and when we recall the names of Browning, and Tennyson, and Swinburne in poetry; Whewell and McCosh in metaphysics, and Whately and Mill in logic and political economy, and a great company of other eminent men in the various paths of science, we are ready to pronounce the Victorian age the most splendid era of English literature."

MILLINERY AND HEAD-DRESSES.—Mrs Winship has just received, per last steamer, the latest Parisian Millincry Goods and Laces for HEAD-DRESS, consisting in part of Breakfast Caps, Point Application, Lace Vallenciumes, and the Widow's Rooche, worn by the crown heads of Europe, and the only first imported to the Pacific Coast. Queen Emma, while here, replenished her wardrohe from the stock then and now on haud, at MRS. WINSHIP, No. 23 Poat Street, under the Mechanics' Institute. Through the influence of Queen Emma, Mrs. Wiuship has filled quite a uuuber of orders for the foreign populstion of Houolulu. The ladies of San Francisco should call and examine these heautiful Goods, by which means they will secure the Latest Fashionahle Styles.

WHAT'S THE MATTER?—In passing through Third street yesterday, we saw crowds of people entering a building a few doors below Market street, and we inquired of a passer-hy what's the matter? He answered that they were going to have their pictures taken in the NEW YORK PHOTOGRAPHIC GALLERY, and the cause of the rush was that this took the best and cheapest pictures in the city; the inducement must he much to draw so hig a crowd from Montgomery and the other streets in the northern part of the city.

MAYER'S BAZAAR.—R. Mayer offers at his Bazaar, corner Pine and Montgomery streets, the greatest variety of jewelry, watches, silver plated ware, guitars, music boxes; concertinas, accordeons, opera glasses, etc., etc., to the public of San Francisco, and to the country trade, at prices that defy competition, and is determined to close out his present stock at greatly reduced rates. His heavy case silver watches from the American Watch Company are superior to anything ever before offered to the public. These watches are taking the place of heavy gold watches from the fact that the workmauship is superior, the castings pure silver, and the prices low. The sale of these watches is very extensive on the Pacific coast. Another proof that American manufactures can beat the world. The works are made of platina and never get out of repair. French opera glasses of great power for sale or hire, and all kinds of musical instrumcuts, eight day family clocks, etc. This is a rare chance to invest your money to advantage, at Mayer's Bazaar, southeast corner of Montgomery and Pine streets.

N. B.—An immense assortment of Japanese curiosities for sale.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is bnt the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are persoually acquainted with gentlemeu who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, bnt without success, until they called npon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamatiou of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

RAREY AND THE JACKASSES.

John Rarey, the horse tamer, while he was in Rome, was terribly annoyed, as strangers always are, by the indescribable braying of the jackasses, which, coming to the market early in the morning with vegetables, always improve the hour when strangers are enjoying the half-dozing daylight which immediately precedes the pain of getting up, to bray with special vehemence, singly and in chorus. No one who has not suffered it can appreciate the brickbat-rubbing, saw-filing effect of it on the strongest nerves. Rarey could not stand it—and he swore he wouldn't. He watched the awful little beasts with a professional keenness sharpened by personal pain, to see if there was any practicable way to stop their braying without cutting their throats, but almost resolved to do that, if there was no other remedy. He soon noticed that the animal invariably straightened its tail out as stiff as a poker when the eruction commenced, and he darted with rapidity of genius to the conclusion that as the tail and the bray went together, the bray couldn't go without the tail; so he determined to hold the tail down. He tied a number of heavy lava paving stones to stout strings, with slip-knots on the ends, and while the owners were enjoying their "cafe latta" at some neighboring "cafe," he slipped the nooses over the unsuspicious tails, and retired to watch the result. In a few minutes an especially noisy jackass was seen to open his mouth and gasp convulsively. He stood gaping for three or four seconds. He wheezed, and the lava block swung suddenly to the braying level. But no sound came. He looked plaintively round to his companions, as if to ask them what ailed him. His lips shook, and he dropped the artichoke leaves he had been munching, as the idea entered his superstitious fancy that the devil had somehow got out of the hogs into him. Another tried, but an inarticulate grunt was all that he could reach. They all tried a chorus which had only the same morning rattled and crashed through every street and lane, but in vain. There was silence that day in the "Strangers' Quarter," and rejoicing in every piano from the Piazza del Popolo to the Piazza d'Espagna.

Dubbs, the speculator, met Stubbs, the real estate broker in the street, one windy, dusty, March day, and, hailing Stubbs, asked him how real estate was. "Well," said Stubbs, taking off his spectacles and wiping the dust out of his eyes, "real estate is very active to-day, Mr. Dubbs; every one I see has a spec in his eye."

Does the court understand you to say, Mr. Jones, that you saw the editor of the Augur of Freedom intoxicated?"

"Not at all, sir. I merely said that I had seen him frequently so flurried in his mind that he would undertake to cut out copy with the snuffers—that's all."

A short time since, two young ladies, well known, were holding high converse over the virtues of a certain new dress. "And does it fit well?" asked one. "Fit? as if I'd been melted and poured in."

Editor of the Californian—Sir: Permit me to report to the public, through your columns, the business operations of the BUILDERS' INSURANCE COMPANY, for May:

Number of policies issued	1,070
Average amount insured under each policy	$ 862 69
Average rate per cent	2 11
Net amount of premiums received	19,479 82
Losses for the month	4,726 13
Balance in favor of Company	$14,753 69

All of which, I trust, will be deemed satisfactory.

MORE VIRTUOUS THAN WISE.

A lady of the Methodist persuasion, who was not possessed of a superabundant quantity of cerebro-spinal axis, once got into a meeting intended for the male members of the church only. She was much annoyed to find "only men" there; but commending herself to the care of the Lord she kept her seat with courage, nothing daunted, and trusted that some of the "sistren" would arrive before the services commenced.

If she was annoyed at the presence of the "brethren," minus the usual sprinkling of the other sex, the male members were none the less annoyed at her presence.

What was to be done? She must be got rid of—but how? They did not wish to offend the simple-minded spirit, but as long as she remained, business could not progress. The parson hemmed, hawed, and began to grow nervous; but there she sat bolt upright, a sheep among wolves. At last the parson found courage to say:

"Sister B——, will you please retire?"

Imagine the consternation of the "wolves" when, with an indignant flush mounting up her cheeks, she arose and exclaimed in a tone that indicated virtuous indignation in the superlative degree:

"No! I'll leave the house first!"

And leave the house she did. She has since moved to another town and joined the Congregationalists.

MORAL: Virtoo is its own reward.

THE MONSTER BELLS OF THE WORLD.—In making large bells, loudness rather than pitch is the object, as the sound can be conveyed to a much further extent. This accounts for the enormous weight of some of the largest bells. St. Paul's, for instance, weighs 13,000 pounds; the bell of Antwerp, 16,000 pounds; Oxford, 17,000; the bell at Rome, 19,000 pounds; Mechlin, 20,000 pounds; Bruges, 22,000 pounds; York, 24,000 pounds; Cologne, 25,000 pounds; Montreal, 29,000 pounds; Erfurt, 30,000 pounds; "Big Ben," at the House of Parliament, 31,000 pounds; Sens, 34,000 pounds; Vienna, 40,000 pounds; Novgorod, 69,000 pounds; Pekin, 139,000 pounds; Moscow, 141,000 pounds. But, as yet, the greatest bell ever known is another famous Moscow bell, which was never hung. It was cast by order of the Empress Anne in the year 1653. It lies broken on the ground, and is estimated to weigh 443,772 pounds. It is nineteen feet high, and measures around the margin sixty-four feet. No wonder that it has never been suspended. There are few bells of interest in the United States. The heaviest is probably the alarm bell on the City Hall in New York, weighing about 23,000 pounds. As the Russians make their pilgrimage to the great Moscow bell and regard it with superstitious veneration, so the American citizen honors and venerates the old Independence bell in Philadelphia, for he is not only reminded of the glory of the revolution, but he believes now more than ever in its inscription, since the injunction has been obeyed—"Proclaim liberty throughout the land, unto all the inhabitants thereof."

A COUNTRY editor, describing a new organ, says: "The swell died away in delicious suffocation, like one singing a sweet song under the bed-clothes."

ONLY A DREAM.

BY A. J. RAQUIER.

By the lake, beyond the meadow,
Where the lilies blow—
As the young moon dipt and lifted
Her reflected bow!
Lived and died a dream of beauty,
Many years ago.

Something made the milk-white blossoms
Even whiter grow;
Something gave the dying sunset
An intenser glow;
And enriched the cup of pleasure,
Filled to overflow.

Hope was frail, and Passion fleeting—
It is often so;
Visions born of golden sunsets,
With the sunsets go;
To have loved is to have suffered
Martyrdom below!

By the lake, beyond the meadow,
Where the lilies blow,
Of the glory there that perished,
None shall ever know—
When the human heart was broken,
Many years ago!

EXTRAORDINARY STORY OF A DEAD MAN.—The following curious incident has just come to light. About twenty-one years ago, a young man named Turner was living at a large academy at Amersham, Bucks, filling the position of teacher of languages. One evening he was seized with a fit—he being subject to them—and the next morning his bed-room window was found open and he was missing from the room. About ten days after the body of a young man was found lying, face downward, in some shallow water, and the body was at once supposed to be that of the unfortunate young man, and on a number of the scholars and the relatives viewing the body, they all identified it as that of their teacher and friend. The body in due course was interred by the relatives, and the mother took possession of a watch belonging to deceased, and wore it till her death. A few days ago some of the relatives of Turner received a letter from Ballarat, Australia, and were not a little surprised to find that their relative, whom they believed to be dead and buried, and whose grave they had kept up ever since, was still alive, quite well, and in a very comfortable position.

HOW NAMES CHANGE.—A Scotchman named Feyerston settled among some Germans in the western part of the State of New York. They translated his name by the sound into the German Feurstein. On his return to an English neighborhood, his acquaintances discovered Feurstein in German means Flint in English. They re-translated his name, and the family name became Flint. One of the grandsons settled on the Arcadian coast of the Mississippi, and with the common fate of his family, his name of Flint became translated by the French into Pierre a-Fusil. His son went North, and the last transformation was a re-translation, and Pierre a-Fusil, hien, so became Peter Gun.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla
TO
Purify the Blood.

NOT A FEW OF THE WORST DISORDERS THAT afflict mankind arise from the corruption that accumulates in the blood. Of all the discoveries that have been made to purge it out, none have been found which could equal in effect AYER'S COMPOUND EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. It cleanses and renovates the blood, instills the vigor of health into the system and purges out the humors which make disease. It stimulates the healthy functions of the body, and expels the disorders that grow and rankle in the blood. Its extraordinary virtues are not yet widely known, but, when they are, it will no longer be a question what remedy to employ in the great variety of afflicting diseases that require an alterative remedy. Such a remedy, that could be relied on, has long been sought for, and now, for the first time, the public have one on which they can depend. Our space here does not admit certificates to show its effects. But the trial of a single bottle will show to the sick that it has virtues surpassing anything they have ever taken. Sufferers from Scrofula, Scrofulous Swellings and Sores, try it and see the rapidity with which it cures. Skin Diseases, Pimples Pustules, Blotches, Eruptions, etc., are soon cleaned out of the system.
St. Anthony's Fire, Rose or Erysipelas, Tetter or Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Ringworm, etc., should not be borne while they can be so speedily cured by AYER'S SARSAPARILLA.
Syphilis or Venereal Disease is expelled from the system by the prolonged use of this SARSAPARILLA, and the patient is left as healthy as if he never had the disease.
Female Diseases are caused by Scrofula in the blood, and are generally soon cured by this EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. Price $1 per bottle, or 6 bottles for $5.
For all the purposes of a family physic, take AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS, which are everywhere known to be the best purgative that is offered to the American People.
Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, MASS., and sold by all Druggists and dealers in medicine everywhere.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

EDWARD J. QUIRK, Plaintiff, vs. JAMES P. HORBACH, et als., Defendants

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the said city and county of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES P. HORBACH, HENRY DELVENDAHL, HENRY BREMMERMAN, ERNST JANSSEN and GUSTAV HELMKE, Defendants:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this District, within twenty days, otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to require you, the said defendants, to set forth the nature of your respective claims to that certain lot or parcel of land situate in said city and county of San Francisco, as particularly described in the complaint herein, being subdivision No. 5 of the 100-vara lot known on the map of the city of San Francisco as No. 276, as designated on a plat of the original subdivision thereof, recorded in the office of the County Recorder of said city and County, in Liber 1 of Certified Grants, at page 156, that all adverse claims of said defendants and each of them may be determined by a decree of this Court; that by said decree it be declared and adjudged that the said defendants, each and all of them, have no estate or interest whatever in or to said parcel of land, and that the title of plaintiff thereto is good and valid, that said defendants, and each of them, be forever debarred from asserting any claim whatever in and to said land adverse to plaintiff, and for such other and further relief as to this Hon. Court shall seem meet and agreeable to equity, with costs of suit against such of the defendants as shall defend this action.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, this 25th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON AND EVENING...JUNE 8th,

Last Two Performances

OF THE WONDERFUL

MIKADO JAPANESE TROUPE,

17 MALE AND FEMALE ARTISTS,

Under the management of J. R. MARSHALL.

The feats of Balancing, with the Tubs, Ladders, Bamboos, Screens, and Boat by the Artist YOSHIGEROO, the Yeddo Hercules, assisted by his Family of Males and Females, are astonishing and picturesque.

TOROONOSKI, the Bloudin of Japan, among other feats, will construct a Ladder of Paper, in presence of the audience, ascend it, and execute a most thrilling performance, walk with Clogs on a Swinging Bamboo, twenty feet long, suspended in the air, ascend a Slack Rope from the floor of the stage to the gallery, making his descent in a most daring and artistic style.

TZENAGEEROO performs the most incredible feat of walking a Ladder of Swords, edge uppermost, barefooted.

The remainder of the Troupe will be found equally interesting, and capable in their different acts, too numerous to mention.

They are acknowledged to be the most efficient and accomplished Troupe of the kind in Japan, and will make every endeavor to win the good opinion of the people of America during their few months sojourn.

ANOTHER DOCTOR IN THE CITY.

DR. H. A. BENTON has been performing many wonderful cures in this city the past two years, and as his practice is fast increasing at the office, finds it difficult to attend outside calls, concluded to invite R. H. OLMSTEAD, M. D., of Napa City, to join him. Dr. Olmstead has been 18 years successfully treating obstinate cases, with water, electricity, and the magnetic forces, (and when needed, Eclectic Remedies, of which he is a graduate of that school); also, being the seventh son of a celebrated Physician, and having a powerful organization, his magnetic hands, like magic, dispel pain and disease in a wonderful manner; he is also a natural BONE SETTER.

DR. OLMSTEAD has this day associated with Dr. H. A. BENTON, the Medical Electrician and Homœpathist, at his office, 314 Bush street, San Francisco, who, having all the necessary facilities, such as the Patent Electro-Chemical, Sulphur, Vapor, Hot Air, and Medicated Baths, which are valuable aids in removing all curable diseases, whether acute or chronic. The combined skill, together with the aid of an excellent Lady Assistant, gives an assurance of CURE TO MANY, BENEFIT TO ALL, AND INJURY TO NONE.

N. B.—Terms within reach of all. Office hours from 9 A. M. to 8 P. M. Sundays, by appointment.

THE OCEAN.

LIKENESS of heaven!
Agent of power!
Man is thy victim!
Shipwrecks thy dower!
Spices and jewels
From valley and sea,
Armies and banners
Lie buried in thee!

What are the riches
Of Mexico's mines,
To the wealth that far down
In thy deep water shines?
The proud navies that cover
The conquering west—
Thou flingest them to death
With one heave of thy breast.

From the high hills that view
Thy wreck-making shore,
When the bride of the mariner
Shrieks at thy roar,
When, like lambs in the tempest,
Or mews in the blast,
O'er ridge broken billows
The canvass is cast;

How humbling to one
With a heart and a soul,
To look on thy greatness,
And list to thy roll;
To think how that heart
In cold ashes shall lie,
While the voice of eternity
Rises from thee!

Yes! where are the cities
Of Thebes and Tyre?
Swept from the nations
Like sparks from the fire:
The glory of Athens,
The splendors of Rome,
Dissolved—and for ever—
Like dew in the foam.

But thou art almighty—
Eternal—sublime—
Unweakened, unwasted—
Twin brother of time!
Fleets, tempests, nor nations,
Thy glory can how;
As the stars first beheld thee,
Still chainless art thou!

But hold! when thy surges
No longer shall roll,
And that firmament's length
Is drawn back like a scroll;
Then—then shall the spirit
That sighs by thee now
Be more mighty, more lasting,
More chainless than thou!

JOHN AUGUSTUS SHEA.

Yosemite Valley.

The effects of the air of Yosemite on certain constitutions are terrible. This is the sort of ernption which it has produced in the case of a correspondent of the Alta signing himself—or herself—"Yosemite."

"Travellers are beginning to skim over the roads like winged birds, and the merry jest and gay laugh go out cheerily on the golden air as they lope away toward the renowned mammoth trees and the grand Yosemite. The miner drops his shovel to gaze, and the Chinamen hold a noisy pow-wow as the lively strangers dart past their gold-saving sluices."

When the travellers begin to "skim," proceed to "lope" and finally "dart" and one of them is driven to gush in such a manner as does this correspondent, we cannot believe that Yosemite is a healthy place.

THE LION'S MOUTH.

"THE gravest beast is an ass, the gravest bird is an owl, the gravest fish is an oyster, and the gravest man is a fool." SYDNEY SMITH.

"I WILL roar, that I will do any man's heart good to hear me." A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

"I WILL aggravate my voice so, that I will roar you as gently as any sucking dove; I will roar you an 't were any nightingale." IBID.

"Nil falsi audeat, nil veri non audeat dicere." CICERO.

A Learned Dialogue.

Williamson Shooks, a man who has an unquenchable thirst for knowledge, and is most frank in his acknowledgement of the defects in his education, the other day met Wilfer Wahoo, whom Shooks believes to be a very fine scholar, and the following dialogue occurred:

SHOOKS. (Catching Wahoo by the arm). My dear fellow! This is, I might say, almost providential. I havn't seen you for six months, and now I come across you at a time when you can help me out of a serious trouble.

WAHOO. (A little scared, thinking, of course, that Shooks wishes to borrow money of him.) Really, I'm sorry, but, Mr. Shooks, I don't think you could have applied to a worse man. I'm incapable—

SHOOKS. No sir. There isn't a man in San Francisco so capable as yourself of rescuing me from the dilemma in which I at present find myself. I know, sir, that you can tell me the derivation of the word aristocracy.

WAHOO. (Much relieved, but at the same time taken off his guard.) Oh, yes. Certainly. "Aristocracy," originally. "Aristocracy" now corrupted. Of course, Shooks, you remember Ariosto was a great swell in ancient times—or modern times—you know, at any rate, he ruled a lot of other fellows, "cracy," you know, from the Greek, and then after him when a swell ruled a lot of fellows who weren't swells they called it Ariosto-cracy. Only a corruption

SHOOKS. (Puzzled.) Is that it?

WAHOO. (shaki Shook's hand nervously Yes, good by, Shooks always come to me when you're in any fix of that kind. (Aside.) Oh dear! It wouldn't do to confess to Shooks but I have been desperate.

Poor Wahoo has since this unfortunate affair been afraid to appear in the streets, but he in the solitude of his chamber prays that Shooks may receive due punishment for having been the cause of his making such a terrible blunder. Shooks is at the present time firmly convinced that Ariosto-cracy is the original word from which aristocracy was derived, but has been unable to discover whether Ariosto was an ancient Roman or a modern Greek.

The Coming Fourth.

Again is Young America to be made glad by guns, pistols, cannon crackers, processions and an increased burthen of pocket money. Again will Old America be victimized and profanely deprecate the patriotic racket. Again is the annular procession to move, the honored poet of the day to sweat and groan in the preparation of his patriotic verse, and the vast and enthusiastic assemblage to eagerly wait for the tedious and humdrum orator of the day to conclude his oration. There will be ten thousand drunks. Washington, Jefferson and Franklin will from the battlements of heaven look on that day over a vast crowd of their inebriated fellow countrymen. Again will individuals of aspiring tendencies be gratified by appointments as marshals, roaders and other chimney pot offices peculiar to the day, whereby sufficient glory and satisfied ambition will be secured them to last the whole year.

Speaking of the measures necessary to ensure a general turn-out, the Flag asks "how can the people be got out?" We suggest that they be paid for turning out. We believe that the most imposing procession by far that San Francisco ever witnessed could be got up at the rate of fifty cents per head. The surrounding country would then eagerly rush in and take a part and draw their celebratorial perdiem. The Chinese would, so induced, eagerly swell the patriotic throng. The inhabitants of the South Sea Islands, the denizen of Oakland, aye, even the unaspiring digger would in such a case, be too happy to march under the protection of our glorious banner. We ourselves would go, and enlist our children.

The Methodist Religion.

A certain newspaper publishes the following:

"The use of tobacco has been prescribed by the Vermont Methodist Conference. Hereafter no person addicted to this habit will be admitted to membership."

We have carefully re-read the ten commandments and cannot find "Thou shalt not smoke." However, it is just possible that the Vermont Methodist Conference took out one of the commandments—perhaps the shortest one—and put in this one to fill up.

A Maniac's Longings.

An unfortunate maniac who left on the last boat for Stockton observed to us that he would not be satisfied like Archimedes to move the world, but if he could get some standing point on the outside would rip up the Atlantic cable and [illegible] for a "returning ball."

A Deaf Mute on the "Alta."

We are pleased to learn a deaf mute is to be employed as local editor on the Alta. The gentleman who reported the exhibition of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum says in speaking of its inmates; "A thorough knowledge of grammar as well as of history was shown." This same gentleman (can it be Fitz-Smythe who has recently returned from Arizona?) who so admires grammar says:

"About sixty were present, and they presented, collectively, a most pleasing appearance, and no one could look upon the assemblage without a strong feeling of sympathy for children deprived of attributes that only those who know the loss can comprehend how great are their value. The pity or compassion of the large audience was evidenced during the evening for the interesting class, and it must have been a consolatory reflection that the State has most liberally provided for their education and support."

It is just possible that the present local reporter of the Alta is one of the inmates of the Idiot Asylum let out on a holiday. He says:

"During the evening many bouquets were thrown upon the stage to testify admiration and sympathy for the excellence of the boys and girls, and applause—heartfelt applause—was frequently given, but more than one half of the pupils were unconscious of this tribute to their superior learnings acquired under disadvantageous circumstances."

As the deaf could see the spectators clapping their hands and the blind could hear the plaudits of those who liked their music the above statement must be taken cum grano salis. Seriously, the Alta's English is becoming intolerable and were it not that Fitz-Smythe is said to have returned we should be at a loss how to account for it.

Pilgrims Bound for the Holy Land.

In the telegraphic news we find the following paragraph:

"Among the passengers of the Quaker City for the Holy Land are the two Beechers, "Mark Twain," Miss Larrowe, of California, Maggie Mitchell and mother."

We are not much interested in the fact that "Miss Larrowe, of California," has started for the Holy Land, the departure of Maggie Mitchell and mother disturbes us but little, we are slightly agitated at the exodus of the two Beechers, but the incursim of "Mark Twain" on holy ground fills us with [illegible]. Mark has a good sized bump of veneration, but we fear the relics in the Holy Land will be handled by him in a manner which will bring upon him the wrath of the Holy Catholic Church. He would have no scruples to prevent his suggesting that the toe-nails of St. Paul be boiled down for glue. We fear that he will insist on assaying the nail from the true cross, and will investigate all the relics and miraculous paintings, in a manner which will be thought irreverent. We trust "Mark" will remember that he is not in California, and will, as much as in him lies, cultivate, rejuvenate, and bring to a state of perfection his early religious education. Our hope lies in the two Beechers, and the fact that "Mark" once went as a missionary to the Sandwich Islands.

The New York "Clipper's" San Francisco Correspondent.

Some person of the name of Allien has been interfering with the business of the correspondent of the New York Clipper. On this account the following appears in a paper published in this city:

"Allow me through the columns of your paper, to denounce this same Allien as he deserves. In the first place, he is not correspondent for the New York Clipper; the Clipper only employ men who can write the English language correct, and then the Clipper only employ men who have too much honor and pride to attempt blackmailing people. I doubt very much that Mr. Allien is correspondent for the New York Mercury; I know that when he tells people he is correspondent for the Clipper, he tells them an unmitigated falsehood.

Yours truly, CHARLES DE LACY.
Correspondent N. Y. Clipper and Cincinnati Commercial."

Mr. Charles De Lacy proves most exclusively that he—and not Allien—is the correspondent of the New York Clipper in this city by saying: "the Clipper only employ men who can write the English language correct."

A Well-Regulated Town.

An exchange informs us that: A circus was lately refused permission to exhibit in Lee, Berkshire County, Massachusetts, lest it should disturb the deep religious feeling now prevailing there.

This paper forgets to mention the fact that a religious revival was only a short time previously nipped in the bud in consequence of the circus having arrived one day before the revival. Lee, Berkshire County, Massachusetts is one of the best regulated towns in the whole United States. All the children have the measles at the same time, all the people experience religion at the same time, and the only reason that the above mentioned circus was not allowed to play was that it arrived just at the time when all the people had spent their money and began to feel religi-ous.

It Might be Worse.

The Alta complains that "the female who delights in wearing pantaloons" is now wearing a different colored dress. It says:

"The color of the unmentionables was drab, and they looked no only unseemly, but disgusting."

Probably if the lady had appeared in "her buff" the effect would have been still more unseemly.

THE BURNING OF WILDGOOSE LODGE (COUNTY LOUTH.)

ABOUT nine o'clock on a wild October night, 1816 (the year after Waterloo), a lonely little chapel at Stonetown, in the county Louth, many long miles from Dundalk, is filled by a mysterious party of about forty men, wrapped in the rough heavy-caped frieze greatcoats of the ordinary Irish peasants, and armed with rude, guns, horse-pistols, bludgeons, old gun-barrels set in pistol-stocks, and pitchforks. The men look savage, pale, and worn; many of them have ridden from great distances—from outlying villages in Meath, Cavan, and Monaghan. There are farmers and fishermen from the coast, blacksmiths, artisans, and farming lads, men of all ages and classes; their brows are knit, their mouths are compressed by the sense of a horrible secret about which they mutter under breath. They have met for no midnight mass. They are bent on no pilgrimage to Croagh Patrick, or the entrance of Purgatory, on the island of Lough Deargh. No Priest is on his way to exhibit the host to these pertrubed men. The sacred bell will not tinkle that night within that roadside chapel, nor the crucifix be raised above their heads by a robed minister of God. They have not the air of men who come to kneel or who wish to unburden their souls before the holy altar. They are bent on work to further which either the Virgin, the saint, or the angels can be invoked. They are looking at the hammers and triggers of pistols; they are loadiug guns; they are fixing and sharpeuiug bayonets with hideous smiles of cruel meaning. They are cursing the boys of Drumbridge and Ennisheen for being late, and cheering the gosoons of King's Court and Ballynavorneen for beiug early, though they had to come through the bogs on foot.

It is not difficult to sketch the place of the Ribbonmen's meeting—a plain whitewashed little chapel, with a strip of green before the door, and inside the railings a large iron cross, with the emblems of the Passions attached to it by a crown of thorns. The interior of the dimly lit building is plain and poor, a timber roof, whitened walls, with here and there a staring colored picture of the Virgin or St. Patrick, or a list of services or pilgrimages, a few rough chairs and benches, at the east end a deal platform, upon which the priest paces up and down while he delivers his sermon. On this platform stands the altar with the receptacle for the host—a plated sort of watch-case surrounded by metal rays. There are a few horn-books and dog's-eared primers, and there is a cane lying in the window; for Stonetown being a poor place, the school is held in the chapel, and all day the parish clerk and schoolmaster, Pat Devan, has been beating into the barefooted, quick, ragged peasant childreu scraps of dog Latin, dreary sections of the multiplication-table and fragments of Irish grammar. Those black sods lying in a heap by the low smouldering fire of red-hot peat are the fees that each boy brings daily to pay for his rough schooling. The chapel is hot, reeking and close, for it has not been opened since the classes left.

Mr. Devan is held by the country people, the peat-cutters, and ploughmen of Stonetown and Reagstown, to be a prodigy of learniug. The only wonder is, that he never went to carry off all the prizes at Mayuooth, or to astonish the learued Jesuits at St. Omer. He can read the breviary in Latin, and can repeat the prayers for the dead almost as well as Father Murphy. He knows the Hours by heart, and can recite long poems in Irish. He can hardly ask you how you are, or how the wife and childen are, without bringiug in the Latin. No one prostrates himself lower or with more solemnity when the bell rings and the host is elevated; no one in Louth has gone more pilgrimages, or performed more stations. No one can tell you more about the Holy Father, and the great ceremonies at Rome; and whist! he is one of us; he is in all the secret societies. It is in this chapel the Ribbonmen meet and discuss their plans of attacking houses for arms, to be ready for the next risiug. He denouncces traitors and spies. He know when Meath is ready, Monaghan is up, when Cavan is troubled, when Loutb has got something on its mind. As he is the clerk of the parish as well as schoolmaster, he keeps the key of the chapel, so that no one but those who ought to know it, need know of the meetings of the Whiteboys or the United Irishmen. The halo of the priesthood surrounds him also; he is at once respected and feared. The village priest, a worthy, portly, easy man, may or may not wink at these political meetings. At all events, he is not here to-night, but is no doubt by his own cozy fire, warming his toes and reading one of the Fathers near a table on which pleasantly steams a reasonable quiet glass of whisky-punch; or he is thinking of his pleasant college days, as he watches the last bit of peat burn clear and blue in the frugal little grate.

It is indeed a violent troubled night for a rendezvous; one of those nights when the fir-trees writhe and struggle with the wind, the oaks rock angrily, and the elms lash the air in a restless despair. The wind is tearing off the dead leaves by sheaves at a time. Dead leaves dry and crackle down every lane. Clouds of yellow leaves break out of sudden corners, and fill the air for a moment, before they scatter in utter discomfiture over the loose stone walls and the lonely miles of mountain, moor and bog. The wind has demoniacal outbursts of anger that relapse into shrewish cries at keyholes, fretful rattliugs at shutters and doors, hollow moans and shuddering vibrations down chimneys. If ever the devils wander in the darkuess prompting hopeless men to despair, urging bad men to murder and to cruelty, and rejoiciug at the growth and progress of wickedness wherever planning or accomplishing, this is the night that should bring them on such ghastly journeys, such is the storm that should shroud and cover them in their exulting search, leaving behind, a wake of wreck, death, and destruction.

Devan goes round to the men in the chapel, the fresh-colored striplings and the old scarred wicked-looking rascals who fought in 'Ninety-eight, and gives them the sign and countersign of the night. There is not much said above a whisper, but the gestures, at which they laugh hideously, seem to typify gibbets with men hanging, and prayers offered up for such men. Then Devan takes a peat from the fire, blows sparks from the lighted end, and waves it over his head. There is a suppressed shout and a wave of guns and pitchforks, as some one produces a bottle of whisky and an egg-shell; the fiery liquor is passed round, till the eyes of the conspirators begiu to glitter, and a cruel alacrity inspires the tired men, whom Devau now selects and divides into two bands. Then, carrying the lighted turf, Devan leads them into the road in a rough military order, and carefully locks the chapel door behiud him. They march from that chapel by the Mill of Louth almost silently. Are they merely going to drill, or are they going to attack some farmer's house? Many do not yet know; all that many kuow is that they have been called from the forge and plow, the fishing-boat and the shibbeen, on some secret errand of the Ribbonmen committee, and that they dared not refuse to come. But Devan and M'Cabe, Marron and M'Elarney, they know, for they are the leaders, and every one will soon know. Through the ranks from time to time spread the words, "Remember, boys, who hung Tierney, Coulan and Shanley; we must show no mercy to them that showed none." Then there roll along a ground-swell of deep curses and execrations in Irish, as Devan waves the turf torch. that glows scarlet in the wind.

In the meantime, other bands are converging to the same spot. A party of men, with guns, pistols, and loaded sticks, have come from the cross-roads of Correcklick, where others bave joined them; again, at the cross-roads of Ballyuavoreen, others have come riding up smiling and shoutiug; at the cross-roads of Dumbride there have also been recruits; and even at Churchtown there was one armed man waiting. At Churchtown, the men on foot, knowing the country every "shap" and dyke, leap away to Reaghstowu Chapel, the near way across the fields, but the horsemen (many riding double) ride to Reaghstown by the road to Tullykeel.

There are near upon a hundred now; savage-looking fellows, many of them with bad forehcads. high cheek-bones, and coarse cruel mouths, ready for any crime. They are near the place of action; at Arthurstown Chapel more whisky is produced; they maddeu themselves with driuk; for there is work to do, and there may be fighting, if the dragoons come down on them. The fierce fellow who leads the Reaghstown detachment boasts that he has a party that can be relied on, and he goes to Campbell, who brought up the men from Dumbride, and, flourishing a pistol, swears that if any of either party flinch he will blow their brains out.

Beyond Reaghstown Chapel the country gets very wild, and there is one narrow swampy lane which horses can hardly traverse. There is one small farm-house on a piece of rising land; at this season almost surrounded by water, it is only approachable (except in a boat) by the narrow pass leadiug from the south side of Reaghstowu Chapel laue. The bog is a wild mournful, desolate place, much like any other of the five million acres of bog that give a mournful monotonous character to Irish scenery; wide tussocky tracks, untouched since the Deluge, great thorny lumps of furze, tangled nets of bramble, giant hillocks of rush, tufts of coarse dead grass, acres of heather; deep treuches are cut in the madder-colored peat earth for drainage, from which the snipe darts and zig-zags when you approach; little black peat-stacks; these form the only landmarks to break the melancholy level, or here and there a little heap of coarse reedy grass; everywhere, by the dark chocolate slices dug but yesterday, or the dustier and more friable sections of the older workings, the wild cotton scatters its delusive little tufts of snowy filament, with which the wild duck will line its random nest. In the prairies, in the virgin forests, in the jungle, among the icebergs, between the glaciers, there is nothing so desolate and repulsive as an Irish bog, though beneath it lies the inexhaustible wealth of a soil whose riches have been accumulating since the Flood, and which needs only the magic touch of Hope and Industry to spring and blossom into plenty.

Such spots, colonised by needy, energetic, and ventnrous men, are dreary enough, even under a bright sun and pure sky; but in autumn, on a howling restless night, they are perfectly purgatorial in their dismal and deserted barrenness; they seem the end of the world, and outside all civilization. Such may have been the aspect of the earth when the dragon lizards, those disbelievers in progress, dominated alone, and trampled as conquerors over their muddy dominion.

In the lane leading to this bog stood a laborer's house.

A man named Pat Halfpenny and his wife lived there. They were sitting by the fire talking over the events of the day, and listining to the wind that, swelling and raging, then weariug down to a tired lull, seems all at once to give birth to strauge sounds like the voices of advanced men and the trampling and splashing of horses' feet. The wife clings to her husband; they tremble; for the fear of death is upon them, and their hearts beat so loud that they can hear the beating almost as clearly as that of the clock which ticks on the wall. A moment after, there comes an imperative tap at the door—the knock of men who will force their way in if they are not instantly admitted. Two stern men, one of them with a gun, enter, the moment the door is tremblingly opened; without speaking, they go up to the hearth; taking a little pot, they put three or four red-hot peats in it, and are about to go off with them. The poor woman falls on her knees, clasps her hands, and prays them not to take the fire away at such an hour. She does not know what it is for, but she suspects some horrible revenge. The men push her away angrily. The one with the gun says to Halfpenny:

"If we hear a word from you or your wife, we'll drag you out; if you dare to look after us, you spalpeen, I'll blow the shot in this gun-through you."

They then leave a sentry at the door, and go on toward Lynch's, another house further on. Halfpenny, listening in intense fear, presently hears a clamor of talking, shouting, and mustering, and then the tramp of horses.

When the sound has gone by, and Halfpenny thinks all is safe, and opens his door to go and call his neighbor, Carrol, he hears a fierce voice in the darkness that tells him to shut the door or he will be shot.

There is no disguise now about the Ribbonmen's intention. They are going to attack a lone house, called Wildgoose Lodge, inhabited by a farmer named Edward Lynch, who at the last Louth summer assizes prosecnted the three Ribbonmen, Tierney, Coulan, and Shanley, for breaking into his house to obtain arms. The resistance had been desperate. The prisoners were unmistakably identified, and were convicted and executed at Dundalk, to the open horror and indignation of the Ribbon societies. Lynch's son-in-law, Thomas Rooney, and a laboring boy, named James Rispin, were the chief witnesses.

In that lone house on the bog, they are busy at work, or sitting singing and laughing round the fire, while supper is preparing: Lynch and his wife, his brave son-in-law, James Rispiu, another laborer, Elizabeth Richards a servant, and another woman, and a child.

Devau and Malone, the captains of the two bands, have spread their men, according to order, to the right and left round the hill on which the doomed house is; they are closiug in upon their victims, with guns and pistols ready. The lighted peat, roused by the wind and waviug to and fro, breaks into a blaze, and is a moving signal for the circle of Ribbonmen. Their cruel object is to prevent any of the hated Lynches from runniug down to the water and escaping in the darkness by swimming and wading to the land, or hiding in the heather clumps on the bog. Gologly and other men, left in the lane to hold the horses, laugh and dance as they see the circle formed. M'Elarney has refused to help hold the horses, sayiug he is as fit to go to the burning as any man there.

The sound of voices has by this time aroused the Lynch family. They look out, they see the moving light and hear the threatening sounds that can only mean mischief. They guess in an instant that the Ribbonmen are on them, to revenge their three dead comrades. Rooney snatches down his gun and prepares for defence. Some rush and bolt the hall door. The assailants make a charge at it with their gun-butts and strong shoulders. A voice from within cries:

"The first that comes in or out, I'll shoot him!"

Devan answers hoarsely through the darkness, the fire glaring on his face, so that it even more than usually resembles an evil spirit's:

"Don't think it is old times with you, Rooney; this night is your doom."

There is no more said, but several shots flash from the windows, and a man named Keeran is burned in the face by the powder of one discharge. The Ribbonmen fall back, and do not again attempt to force an entrance. Devan and Malone then cry out to fire the house at the back. With a savage eagerness the wretches run to the hay-yard, and collect great heaps of dry flax, unthrashed oats, and straw. The two men who fetched fire from Halfpenny's—determined men, and one of them a robber by profession—are ordered to light a bundle of flax and thrust it into the thatch of the roof. There is a crackling, a glare, a blaze, that shows at once the ring of red howling faces, and makes the bayonets and gun-barrels gleam crimson. Devan cries:

"We will show the country boys that there shall be no informers allowed in it."

The fire spreads over the roof with dreadful rapidity, flashing from end to end, with a crackling roar and fierce volumes of reddened smoke. In a few minutes a sheet of water, which almost insulates the house, seems turned into a sea of blood, the windows glitter in the blaze, and the glass snaps and falls. Through the horrible glare, the ring of rejoicing wretches must seem to the unhappy creatures within like a circle of exulting devils.

Nothing but God's voice from heaven or the avenging hands of Angles can save the Lynches now. Devan's party know it, and dance and toss up their brimless hats, and wave their guns and pitchforks, with the ferocity of cannibals. The poor women, too, and the children, what have they done? What do they know of prosecutions and Ribbonmen conspiracies—they who were defended so bravely by Lynch and Rooney when they fought for their lives against the midnight thieves? Perhaps, even now, tearing themselves from the groaning women and screaming children. Lynch, Rooney, Rispin, and his fellow-servant, may load their guns to the muzzle, sharpen some knives for their belts, and, throwing open the door, turn mad and rush down on these murderers. If they fail to break through the circle, they may at least kill some, and die bravely.

But there is no time for this; the farmer has his wife in his arms, Rooney has his little child crying for help, the farm-servants have their sweethearts clinging to them, and praying hysterically for mercy—clinging with the agony and despair of drowning creatures. The burning timbers of the roof and the masses of blazing thatch fall on them, and set their clothes on fire, the house glows like a furnace, the fire starts in at the windows, the walls are growing red hot, the beds and chairs and floor are breaking out into flames. The men and women fly past the windows, from this corner to that, like terrified animals in a burning forest; their cries pierce and rend the air.

The only answer their murderers give, is a shout: "Let none survive; not one must live to tell of it!" And they pile more straw on the roof. The sky over the lonesome swamp gets redder—redder, and men far away at Andee and Enniskeen see it and know what is being done.

Bryan Lemmon, one of Devan's gang, springs forward with a pouderous sledge-hammer, and toling like a Titan, drives in and shatters the hall door with a dozen crushing blows. The bayonets and guns move nearer; will Devan's men rush into this furnace, and slay all they meet? No, their hatred is now too intense and fiendish for such a shortening of their sport. A dozen of them bring armfuls of flax and oat straw, and push them blazing into the rooms. The hay-yard furnishes the funeral pile for its unhappy owner. So do the stables, where the horses kick and plunge, maddened by the heat and noise and glare.

The women and children fly from room to room, up-stairs and down. They crouch, they hide, they pray, they scream, and their screams are heard far beyond the flame, far into the darkness, scaring the heron and the fox. The wretched Lynch's well-known form is seen crossing a window, and Devan gives orders to fire at him. He cannot resist that order, though it rather shortens the boy's fun. They fire, but he does not fall. A more terrible death awaits him. Lynch is seen no more. The lad Rispin, younger and more passionately eager for life, clambers on to a side-wall, from which the roof is now burnt away, and supplicates for mercy. Mercy! Ask a shark for mercy when he turns to snap, or a wolf after a second bite at the lamb. The answer is a dozen clashing bayonets in his side and back; and he topples, screaming, headlong into the seething caldron of flame.

Bursts of fire and smoke from the windows; one thrilling scream, a thrill shriek from a child; then a deep and terrible silence. The house glows like a red-hot crucible. Look in at the windows and you see only a raging volume of flame. At last the red rafters of the roof fall in, crashing and snapping a storm of sparks glitters before the wind, a gust of flame rises up, then a tall pillar of illuminated smoke. The fire abates, and settles down over the eight poor murdered people. Devan and his men discharge their guns in noisy joy, the circle of one hundred monsters toss their hats, huzza, and cry:

"Lynch, we wish you luck of your hot bed."

Malone and another man say, as they go:

"All is well now, if we only had Mr. Fligate" (the Louth magistrate, who tried the three Ribbonmen whom poor Lynch had convicted).

It has been a glorious night's work for the Ribbonmen. When they leave the house—an hour ago so cheerful, now a charred vault—Campbell shouts to Gologly and the others, who have been holding the horses in the boggy part of the lane.

"We burned the little ones as well as the big ones, and left no one to tell the story; Begor! Lynch and Rooney won't go and inform against us again."

This very Gologly to whom he thus spoke betrayed Campbell, and brought him to the gallows.

Early in the morning, after this dreadful event, a man named Owen Reilly, whose cabin is about four miles from Lynch's house, hears voices in the road, and, being alarmed, barricades his door. A body of armed men at that hour can mean no good. There is a loud and angry rapping, but he is still unwilling to open, till the voices insist on it, assuring him that no harm is meant to anybody in that house. They merely want something to eat and drink. Reilly opens the door, and sees some savage-looking, smoke-blackened men, who call for oaten bread and a bowl of milk. They are sullen, tired, and one of them has a black scorched wound on his face. That is Keeran, whom Lynch had wounded.

Next day the ruin of poor Lynch's house is visited by half the country-side. Mr. Filgate rides over and inspects with horror the four blackened walls, and the charred and ghastly remains of the eight murdered people. The peasants stand silently round, in secret sorrow or secret approval. The sunshine falls on the white ashes of the roof, the broken door, and the trampled garden strewn with half-burned straw.

The crowd opens and part, when an old woman, bowed with grief, and tossing her arms like a keener at an Irish funeral, comes to look at the black mummies that so short a time ago, were human beings. She recognizes two of them—her son whose shoulder, with a birth-mark on it, is still unconsumed; and Biddy Richards, one of the maid-servants. The rest she cannot guess at, they are so dreadfully burned. Poor Rooney is found sitting beside his wife, with the blackened body of his fine little boy, only five months old, sheltered between his knees. The sledge-hammar lies on the grass near the door, and the garden is littered with straw and flax.

There are too many people in this horrible conspiracy for the whole to reman long undiscovered. Devan is at once seized. It is noticed that a neighbor named M'Cabe is not among the people who flock to see the ruins of Lynch's house. A laborer, named Greenan, who goes to Liswinny to tell Mr. Filgate, the magistrate, of the events, is told M'Cabe is lame, and confined to the the house with a "touch me not," or boil on the knee. But Alice Rispin sees him, two days after the fire, vaulting over a ditch, and in perfct health, and soon after an informer deposes to his having been seen at the fire.

Approvers soon come in, tempted by the reward of fifteen hundred pounds—not very reputable men—generally thieves or outlaws—but still clear and consistent in their stories, all witnesses of the crime, all active sharers in its accomplishment. The first, Bernard M'Ilroy, was once a soldier in the Meath militia. He informs to Mr. Filgate. He had been forced into the business by Devan, and had not dared to refuse to help burn Wildgoose Lodge. A second approver, Peter Gologly, who was in jail for a murder, held the horses in the lane, saw the blaze, heard the shots fired, and the huzzaing. Michael Kernan, a third approver, will confess afterwards that he knows nothing, except on hearsay from M'Ilroy, who told him they should share some seven thousand pounds reward. Thomas Gubby, another approver, is a thief; Patrick Murphy, the last approver, is under sentence to be hanged at Trim as as a thief and murderer when he comes forward as a witness against the men by this time seized and thrown into prison.

These wretches were tried before the Honorable Justice Fletcher at the Louth Lent assizes, held in Dundalk on the 5th, 6th, and 7th of March, 1817, for the burning of Edward Lynch and his whole family of eight persons.

Serjeant Joy, in opening the case with much force and eloquence, "deplored the wretched state of depravity into which the lower orders of people in this country seemed to have fallen. No sooner did an honest individual seek redress of injuries from the impartial laws of his country, than an infernal conspiracy was entered into for his ruin. The unfortunate Lynch had evinced his conrage and honesty in the prosecution of these ruffians, and was therefore devoted to destruction. A conspiracy was immediately entered into to deprive him of his life. Villains fron the north from the south, from the east and from the west; from the counties of Monaghan, Louth, Cavan, and Meath; all combined in a diabolic conspiracy to assassinate the man who had dared to appeal to the laws of his country for protection and redress. It was a remark worthy of attention, that religious parties had nothing to do with this most horrible transaction. murderers and the murdered were of the same religion—all Catholics. It was founded upon an utter abhoreuce of all law, of all distributive and impartial justice."

The three first prisoners, M'Cabe, Keeran (the man with the black wound), and Campbell were first found guilty. They received the sentence of death with a savage and sullen obduracy.

Next day, Craven, Marron, Gainer, Malone, Lennan and Butler were also found guilty, and sentenced to death; the judge ordering their bodies to he delivered over to the surgeons for dissection. On the verdict being passed, the murderers broke out into a clamorous protest of adjurations and curses. Their hard and cruel faces showed with how little remorse they would have thrown the judge and jury into flames. They would scarsely be pacified or induced to listen to the judge's address, in which he twice broke down, overcome by the poignancy of his feelings. Before the sentence of death was finished, Malone seized a Testament which lay near him, and swore in the name of God and the Virgin that he was innocent. The crier snatching it from his hand, he broke into shouts and curses against the judge, the jury and the police. He was removed still pouring forth those black, bitter, semi-Oriental imprecations with which the Irish language abounds'

The next day, three other prisoners were also found guilty. During his cross-examination, Murphy, the approver, confessed that, as a Ribbonman, he was sworn to obey his brethren to the utmost of his power, and that if ever again at liberty he would do the same under similar circumstances.

In summing up, Judge Fletcher said:

"The crime with which the prisoners stood charged was perhaps the most enormous which had ever come before him in his judicial capacity. How it was proved it was for them to decide. Ho knew (he said) that they would fully discharge their duty."

His lordship then exhorted the jury to consider the whole business dispassionately and maturely. If they entertained any doubt, the prisoners at the bar were to have the full benefit of that doubt. Such is the beneficial spirit of that law, which the wretched and infatuated people who have perpetrated the crimes in question have sought to destroy.

The jury retired for a short time and found a verdict of guilty.

An indescribable scene ensued. The most dreadful imprecations burst forth from the wretched prisoners. M'Elarney, an old and malignant convict, vented his rage by cursing the counsel who had pleaded against him, and by frequently interrupting the judge in pronounciug the awful sentence of death. "I don't care! I don't care what you do with me!" was the incessant cry of the inhuman miscreant.

The ten murderers were hung at Dundalk on the 9th of March. The ninety other villains who had danced round the funeral pile of the Lynches escaped.

In his charge at Armagh, immediately after these executions, Judge Flecher gave a history of the by-gone persecutions of the Catholics of Armagh by the Oranagemen and Break of Day men, who had ruthlessly driven thousands of persons from the country, or, to use their own cruel language, "to hell or Connought." These wonton and unprovoked persecutions, unchecked by the magistrates, magnified by designing and traiterous persons, had led to the fatal origination of the Ribbonmen's associations and subsequently to the deplorable rebellion of 'Ninety-eight, with all its attendant atrocities and cruel massacres.

The excellent and wise judge concluded with a few sentences which were as thoughtful as they were true. "No good," he said, "can accure to you from the prosecution of your neighbors who may believe a little more or a little less, who may worship God in a different temple, or with different observances. The law knows no difference, regards no distinction of color or pretension. For myself, I think it right to say to you, gentlemen, that I regard all these associations as illegal. I care not what the body, whether green or orange, nor what the pretence, nor what the profession—all, I say, are illegal."

It is in crimes like this burning of Wildgoose Lodge that we see the darker side of the fine Irish character, its impetuous conrage turned into cruelty, its deep religious feeling into fetish superstition, its pining for liberty into secret and cowardly conspiracy. Can we wonder that such crimes as this and the Scullabogue, Wexford, and Vinegar-hill massacres, forced the English into severity and repression?

Not Weighed.—The Salem Register hears that a man called at a provisions store in that city, a few days since, and dickered a considerable time about the price of some small article he purchased, soon after his departure the proprietor missed a fine leg of ham. A few hours later a boy was sent to the customer's house to say that his master wished that ham returned, as it was not weighed. The unsuspecting wife (her husband happened to be out) immediately gave the ham to the messenger, who carried it back to the store. It is presumed it is not weighed yet, as it has not been sent back.

In times of good fortune it is easy to appear great—nay, even to act greatly; but in misfortune, very difficult. The greatest man will commit blunders in misfortune, because the want of proportion between his means and his ends progressively increases, and his inward strength is exausted in fruitless efforts.

DR. THRALL ON THE EPISCOPATE.

WE have already made mention of a publication in pamphlet form, entitled "The Episcopate the Missionary Order of the Church," the authorship of which is attributed to the Rev. S. C. Thrall, formerly rector of Trinity Church in this city, and who enjoys as high a reputation in his denomination, for theological and ecclesiastical learning, as Vinton and Ewer do for pulpit eloquence. As Dr. Thrall has numerous warm friends and admirers in this city, who will feel interested in anything that emanates from his pen, and as only a small number of copies of his essay are in San Francisco, we publish a few extracts.

The following contains some principles bearing indirectly upon such cases as the one that has recently been the subject of much discussion in this diocese :

"How little idea the Church has of the dignity, use, responsibility and discretion of Bishops, may be seen by noting the small measure of protection with which their several fields of labor are preserved, to be cultivated according to their judgment. They are carefully protected from each other, so that no Bishop can invade another's jurisdiction by official acts. The provision is wise, and might wisely be extended, by leaving them free to ordain their own clergy, suited to their peculiar fields of labor, instead of compelling them to accept every peripatetic priest or deacon who comes with a letter which certifies his Bishop's ignorance of any just liability 'to evil report for error in religion or viciousness of life,' and who has been ordained not by reason of his fitness for some particular field of duty, but because he has lived through a period of candidateship, and, by the amiability of a standing committee, and the indulgence of examiners, has found himself standing before a Bishop, about to hold an ordination. Then a Bishop of an organized diocese is protected against the invasion of the Board of Missions in the selection of stations and the sending missionaries into his jurisdiction ; but he has no power to hinder the selection of any presbyter in his diocese, and assigning him to any missionary station. This measure of protection, too, is accorded only to a diocesan Bishop. Missionary Bishops, though not created or selected by the board, are turned over to it as soon as consecrated, become their agents, and have only advisory power in the missionary work of their jurisdiction. They report to the board—and worse, their presbyters do the same, and this not through their Bishops, but directly, and so are much more the priests of the board than of their Bishops. Thus missionary Bishops become a convenient appendage, and first class agency of the board. When men learn the value of order and subordination by the stern discipline of war, they fall into no such blunders, and show due and proper respect to official station. Finally, Bishops of all kinds are canonically unprotected against the harmful intrusions of self-constituted societies, by euphemism called voluntary, who may map out a diocese, plant missionaries, and direct their operations after their own indiscreet willfulness. Canonically unprotected we say, for the Church declaring herself a missionary society, and appointing an agency for the direction of her missionary work, all other organizations are lawless, irregular, void of right, and to be shunned alike by men of honor and of honesty. This declaration and appointment protects sufficiently against the intrusion of a gentleman. But not all members of the Church are gentlemen, and the grace of orders does not supply the defect of nature more than others. It might therefore be well to inquire if some protective legislation is not demanded."

Dr. Thrall argues that the missionary work is peculiarly that of the Bishop—the missionary work, that is, not in the modern, but in the Apostolic sense :

THE BISHOP'S OFFICE AND ITS TOILS.

"The Bishop is indeed to reach all the people in his jurisdiction, but not in one day or one year, or one man's life ; but after an economy, as the apostles were to preach the Gospel to all the world. This is the work in which he is chiefly to engage. He is to administer discipline too in his see, to ordain, to confirm, visit and inspect his clergy and their work, be to them a guide, counselor, friend, father. He must teach the teachers. This is part of his work, because he is personally responsible to God for all the work of the Church. But this should so be done as not forgetting or neglecting the peculiar apostolic work of going forth discipling and gathering in from the world those who know not Christ in His body, the Church. As this is a wore peculiar to his office, committed to no other, it cannot be too much to ask that, at the least, one half of his time should be given to that one work ; that his visitation of his diocese should be not merely holding confirmations in organized parishes, but that an equal portion should go to the world ; that he should personally survey and examine all the unoccupied field ; and after the manner of St. Paul, selecting the largest, most promising fields, places which are centers of influence to an outlaying country, in one of these, attended by his deacon, do the missionary work of his apostolic office, till, if the ground proves fruitful, the Church is well established. This is to go to the world and preach the Gospel. This is his commission. Not merely to preach to the Churches. How little this is in the mind of the Church it is sad to think. In what conventional address does one bear an account of such work in a new field. The Bishop who shall furnish such a record will furnish what this age so much seeks, a new sensation, and distance all novelists. We were unfortunately planted by England in reverse order, and are not yet done backing into position. Of generalities we have abundance : 'There remains yet very much land to be possessed'—general appeals for men and means—statements of fact sufficiently obvious to all, and not remarkable for freshness, novelty or force. But where is the leader's bugle call which tells of careful examination, well selected field of contest, nights of prayer, and toil of muscle and sinew and brain day after day, waging, as the appointed leader, the Master's battle till a new post is gained and garrisoned. We mean not that the Bishops are idle. They work hard enough ; but, for the most part, in a treadmill, going a weary round of perfunctory duties. In the present method to the Church they are the pack-horses of the Christain camp, to bear all sorts of rubbish cast on them to lighten other's loads. They come as gleaners. If there is any thankless, heartless, weary work in the Church, it is a Bishop's office as the tyrant custom makes it now. The Bishop leads not, he cannot lead. In a small diocese he often does a priest's duty alone in the largest parish, flitting off on week days as he my to hold a hurried visitation, and back to his priest's work again. In the large sees he plans by night how he may divide his days to give three hours each to parishses, on the average, and get a hurried lunch and catch a train by which to fill the gaps between the services, and still make time for neccssary correspondence."

BOARDS OF MISSIONS.

The Doctor places no very high estimate upon the usefulness of the labors of volunteer associations, and "Boards," organized to do missionary work. On this point he says :

"The way by which the Church has grown shows how little men appreciate the seed and office by which God provided for its growth. Long time it was by that emigration which brought a few devout ones together in a village or hamlet, who, when they found each other out, consulted how they might secure Christian ministration. To aid these small beginnings, societies were formed, most unfortunately miscalled missionary. Bishops are God's missionary society. The low churchmen of New York, by a truer instinct, rightly named theirs a pastoral aid society. But real mission work was chiefly done by zealous priests, who seeing the destitution of outlying districts, with more or less of cost to their own proper pastoral work, went out to a work no ways theirs. These grew to what we misname mission stations, by a society's eking out, ofttimes for years, the scanty pittance on which a minister must live till he can do better. The evil of the system was that centres of influence were not chosen, nor places which gave promise of a large and speedy success. The only element of selection was the accident of a pious emigration, or convenience of access from an established parish—a Darwinian method of natural selection, not of intelligent choice. That the Church has grown so much with such neglectful administration is one of the strongest proofs of her divine life. Nothing human could survive such neglect, to adapt means to ends.

This neglect of method, and the slow growth of the Church, have developed a restive, inquiring, dissatisfied spirit in the Church, tending to experiments to remedy it. The last triennial meeting of the 'Board of Missions' proposed and carried the plan of public meetings to stimulate enthusiasm. What will come of it we cannot say. But till some other method comes mere enthusiasm will do little good. The same restiveness and need of method has developed in the older sees a new agency—that of convocations. This is better simply in that it tends to some system where we have none. But we dislike it thoroughly. It puts a human invention and device in the place of God's appointed agency. A diocese is the unit of the Church. The Bishop is he through whom a diocese and all its members are in communion with the body of Christ—the Church. The work of a diocese is a common work in which all are equally interested. The Bishop is the missionary and chief pastor in his see. His clergy are his assistants. Their interest is in his work, and through him. Convocations (admirable as they are when held for divine service, mutual intercourse, the warming of the hearts of brethren for each other by fraternal companionship, and the attrition of mind with mind), when they enter on the work of missions, create local centres of interest and administration. It grows of and tends to individualism and independency of which we have far too much already. We little understand the idea of relation to the Church, and her work only through the Bishop as it is stated in the Ignatian Epistles, and in the Epistles of St. Cyprian, or any of the early Fathers."

MR. WEBB'S ST. TWEL'MO.

The Eastern critical journals, including the Nation, the Round Table and the New York Weekly Review, speak very favorably of Mr. Webb's last performance. The Weekly Review very justly says :

"Absurd novels are more effectually criticised by satire or burlesque than by serious discussion. To review Miss Evans' 'St. Elmo,' as a work entitled to the least consideration from any person of sense, taste, and culture, would be a waste of time and labor. It is merely a piece of trash, that only deserves to be laughed at. Mr. C. H. Webb, who is both author and publisher of the travestie, 'St. Twel'mo,'—to which we invite the attention of our readers—has very cleverly turned a bad novel into ridicule. Comical as his work is, however, it is not, to our mind, a wit more comical than the original which it burlesques. Thousands of copies of 'St. Elmo,' are said to have been sold ; and, if that piece of absurdity is popular, why shall not the burlesque be popular also? Our earnest wish is, at any rate, that 'St. Twel'mo' may follow wherever 'St. Elmo' has gone. The one will be a corrective of the other."

It may be added, that "St Twel'mo" is not a mere travestie. A serious critical purpose is perceptible to the intelligent reader, showing that the author aimed at exposing in the most effectual, though not the most direct manner, the shallowness and superficiality of such books as St Elmo.

Here is Mr. Webb's description of his hero, "the cuneiform cyclopedist of Chattanooga :"

"A thrill shot along her nerves ; she felt a blind fumbling at her heart-strings ; a presentiment overwhelmed her ; the Pantheistic Necessity that she should marry the rude intruder became evident and apparent—in him she recognized the coming man.

The coming man—that is, the one who had just gone out—was tall and athletic, not exactly young and not percisely elderly ; it would be safe to set him down as middle-aged. According to all accounts, he must have been a rather rum-looking customer ; for his fair chiseled lineaments were blotted by dissipation and blackened and distorted by the baleful fires of a fierce, passionate nature, and a restless, poweful, and unhallowed intellect. Furthermore, he was symmetrical and grand

> As some temple of Juno,
> Whose polished shafts
> Gleamed centuries ago,
> In the morning sunshine
> Of a day of woe,

(this thing resolves itself into rhyme), whose untimely night has endured for nineteen hundred years ; so in the glorious flush of his youth this man had stood facing a noble and possibly sanctified future, (and things) ; but the ungovernable flames of sin had reduced him, like that blackened and desecrated fane, to a melancholy mass of ashy arches and blackened columns, where ministering priests, all holy aspirations, slumbered in the dust.

The dress of this melancholy mass of ashy arches and blackened columns was costly but negligent, and the red stain on his jacket told that his errand had not been fruitless, (from which it might be inferred that he had been strawberrying as well as ducking). As part of this costly but negligent dress, this melancholy mass wore a straw hat and belted with broad black ribbons, and his spurred boots (hunters down there always put spurs on when they chase the wild duck and the fierce snipe to their Lookout Mountain fastness) were damp and muddy."

The following bit of dialogue between St. Twel'mo, and Ætna, the encyclopedic heroine, is capital, and cannot fail to remind those who have read anything of "the great Southern novelist," of the sprightly and erudite conversational style that is common to all her chief characters : St. Elmo speaks :

"'Pardon me if I remind you,' he said, 'of the preliminary and courteous en garde! which should be pronounced before a thrust. De Guerin felt starved in Languedoc, and no wonder! But had he penetrated every nook and cranny of the habitable globe and traversed the Saharas which science accords the universe, he would have died at last as hungry as Ugolino. I speak advisedly, for the true Io gadfly ennui has stung me from hemisphere to hemisphere, across tempestuous oceans, scorching deserts, and icy mountain ranges. I have faced alike the bourrans of the steppes and the Samieli of Shamo, and the result of my vandal life is best epitomized in those grand but grim words of Bossuet : "On trouve au fond de tout le dide et le néant." Nineteen years ago, to satisfy my hunger, I set out to hunt the daintiest food this world would furnish, and, like other fools, have learned finally, that life is but a huge mellow golden Osher, (short for pumpkin,) that mockingly sifts its bitter dust upon our eager lips. Ah! truly, On trouve au fond de tout le vide et le néant!"

"Etna promptly made answer to this sprightly little sally : 'Mr. Murray, if you insist upon your bitter Osher simile, why shut your eyes to the palpable analogy suggested? Naturalists assert that the Solaunni, or apple of Sodom, contains in its normal state neither dust nor ashes, unless it is punctured by an insect, (the Tenthredo,) which converts the whole of the inside into dust, leaving nothing but the rind entire, without any loss of color. Human life is as fair and tempting as the fruit of Aiu Judy, still stung and poisoned by the Tenthredo of sin.'"

LOWELL AND LONGFELLOW.

A writer in the New York Independent, who has been on a literary pilgrimage to the homes of divers down east celebrities, gives the following sketch of the auther of the "Biglow papers :"

"Lowell is very striking in his personal appearance—strikingly handsome he is usually called—though handsome is not precisely the word to use. He looks like one of Ruben's portraits. His head is finely developed in the intellectual and moral organs. His color is prevailingly brown. His strong, reddish-brown hair, parted from the middle of his low but wide forehead, falls in thick curls, down to his shoulders. His beard is of the same color. The expression of his face is not sweet, but earnest and grave rather, except when it is lighted by mirth or inspiration. Lowell is forty-eight years old ; but he looks younger. His form is lithe and compact ; his manners quiet : an air of self-composure is always about him. He is remarkably genial with his friends, fond of jest and tale ; but with strangers he is reserved. Only those see Lowell to advantage who see him intimately—and they see one of the most delightful men in the world."

Of Longfellow and his surroundings, the writer thus speaks :

"The spacious rooms are furnished with ostentatious luxury ; elegant literature is freely strewn about : pictures, engravings, and miscellaneous works of art adorn the walls and grace the mantels. The library, on the second floor front, expresses the occupant. It is a large, sunny room, fitted with books of all languages, that seem to have fallen into their places at the bidding of the muse Here sits the poet. Mr. Longfellow was always a poet to look at—in form, features, and expression a poet. Lawrence's portrait, engraved for the small blue and gold edition of the poetical works, gives an admirable idea of his head and countenance in its finest mood—though not in its domestic aspect. Since the fearful death of his wife, the outward man of the poet has altered much. The step is less buoyant than it was. The bearing less joyous, the look less elate. The florid man has matured into an exceeding mellowness of dignity. Ripe and rich-looking he always was—exquisitely neat in dress and exquisitely elegant in person—though always animated by a sentiment that saved him from the suspicion of foppery. But now he has attained a wonderful completeness of expression. His aspect is that of a bard in the full affluence of his years, and the full wealth of his genius. His silvered hair is long and wavy. His beard grows white and thick beneath his chin, looking like a deep lake ruff than anything else. His voice is melodious as an organ; and his features, handsome as ever, have been touched with new lines, by the action of thought and sorrow. His manners are very beautiful to all persons; and he carries about him that indescribable atmosphere that marks the perfectly cultured gentleman."

SWINBURNE APPRECIATED.

A powerful champion has come to the rescue of the erratic Swinburne, and furnishes in the pages of the Westminster Review, the ablest, the keenest, and the most impartial estimate of that original and daring genius that has yet been published. The reviewer attributes the violent antagonism of a certain class of critics to Swinburne's poetry, to an unduly exclusive admiration of the meditative and contemplative school of Coleridge and Wordsworth. He says:

"It cannot be questioned that Mr. Swinburne's poetry is mainly the outcome and hitherto the highest manifestation of a strong, silent, but very sensible reaction against the principles and practice of the Wordsworthian school of poetry. For the past quarter of a century that school has domineered over English verse-writers; the very greatest of our living poets have not escaped its spell; and the native vigor of their individualities alone has saved them in all important points harmless. We do not intend any disparagement of Wordsworth's own genius, which was of its kind unsurpassed. But it may be acknowledged by his warmest advocates that his influence on English poetry has not been wholly beneficient. It is certain that the fever-fit of admiration for the poet of "The Excursion," which England was seized with after thirty or forty years of neglect, has fostered every one of the special vices of our contemporary works of imagination. Corruptio optini fit pessima. The qualities which made Wordsworth a great poet, have set all the puny choir of fledgeling bards singing of mountains and molehills, if not of metaphysics. The apparent (not real) lack of finish in some of Wordsworth's minor poems has given our younger minstrels a pretext for rudeness and carelessness in their work; and from the same example they have derived the theory that not heroic lives or heroic actions are the proper material in which poetry should work, but rather buttercups and babies.

"Mr. Swinburne's poetry, then, being a protest against the narrow and prudish ideas of the day, has gone, as we have seen, to the opposite extreme, and has boldly given the lie to most accepted conventions. But it is remarkable that a protest so fierce as this has issued in part from another artistic development of Wordsworth's theories; we mean pre-Raphaelite art. The "Poems and Ballads" are dedicated to Mr. Burnes Jones, and two very admirable poems have been suggested by pictures of Mr. Whistler and Mr. Dante G. Rossetti."

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mr. Louis Gaylord Clarke is writing a series of humorous sketches for the Philadelphia Home Weekly, under the general title "Things Remembered." Clarke exhibits still some of the old fire with which he was wont to shine in the Knickerbocker Magazine. In a recent communication he tells this story of Mr. Theodore Tilton, of the Independent, and a landlord at whose table he "boarded." His host, who was continually "short" of money, was in the habit of handing in his bills before they were due, and making apologies for it. On one occasion, when a bill was laid upon Tilton's table, with the customary apologetic note, he enclosed the money in an envelope, with the following reply:

"You need make no excuse, my dear landlord,
I'll pay your bills as soon as they are scored?
For if from me you may,
Before the proper day,
Get pay for board;
Yet also I from you,
Long, long before 'tis due,
Get bored for pay."

Walt Whitman is said to be devoting his leisure to the preparation of a new edition of his poems. The Times thinks "if he could so far yield to what he regards as the prejudices of the public as to omit a few of the poems included in former editions, he would readily not only achieve a wide popularity but make koown some of the finest and noblest strains in the English tongue to persons who probably will otherwise never see them. One thing is certain," says the same critic, "our late war has produced no other verse at all comparable to the poems he has written upon it."

Serpents in Doves' Nests.—Under this rather fanciful title, the Rev. John Todd, D. D., of Norwich Connecticut, has published a pamphlet addressed particularly to married women, urging upon their attention the important duties of maternity, and protesting against what he denominates "Fashionable Murder." Dr. Todd's statements—which, however, we do not care to rehearse—are very startling and terrible. We can but hope that this little book will find its way to the public for whom it is intended, and be instrumental in arresting the progress of the frightful evil which is alleged to exist in our midst.

Mr. Dickens announces yet another collected edition of his writings. It is to be called "The Charles Dickens Edition," and each volume will be accompanied by a facsimile of the author's signature. Mr. Dickens, it is expected, will soon revisit the United Ststes, and give a series of readings from his own works, in the chief cities. He has, by the way, written to Messrs. Ticknor & Fields a letter expressive of his emphatic approval of the illustratrions to the Diamond Edition, furnished by Mr. Sol Eytinge, Jr.

The last number of the Quarterly Review contains a curious article on "The Poetry of the Seven Dials." It discussed the most important and popular of the halfpenny ballads which have been published in London, from the year 1854 down to the effusion suggested by the lions in Trafalgar square. In respect to "dying speeches" it tells us: "Many of these are clearly by the same hand, probably one of the five or six well-known authors, who also chant their own verses in the streets. 'I gets,' says one of the fraternity, 'I gets a shilling a copy for the verses written by the wretched culprit the night previous to his execution.' 'And I,' says another, 'did the helegy on Rush. I didn't write it to horder; I knew that they would want a copy of verses from the wretched culprit. And when the publisher (Mr. Catoach) read it, "that's the thing for the streets," he says. But I only got a shilling for it.' 'It's the same poet as does 'em all,' says a third authority, 'and the same tip; no more nor a bob for nothing.'"

Tennyson's friend, the Rev. F. D. Maurice, has put forth a book on "The Commandments considered as Instruments of National Reformation."

A book was recently announced in London, with this singular title: "The Spirit Disembodied. When we die we do not fall asleep: we only change our place." By Herbert Broughton.

M. C. Hippeau has just published the first part of his Collection of French Poems of the Twelfth and Thirteen Centuries.

Laughton Osborne, the poet and critic, has translated from Apuleius the pretty love story of Cupid and Psyche. It is freed from indelicacy and is entitled "The Birth of Pleasure."

THE NOSE.

It is rather a singular fact that, although the eyes, the mouth, the eyebrows, the eyelashes, the lips—in fact, all the other features of the face, have received commendation from the poets, the nose has been alone, without much passing remark. Throughout all political literature, there seems to have been a strict silence kept on this important subject. No poet has ever yet found courage to write an "ode" to the nose. One would think it would be a very good subject, if for nothing else than for its novelty. It certainly is not worn out, because there has been very little, if anything written about it.

Even in conversation, in every-day life, very light mention is made of the nose. How often we hear the expression: "What beautiful eyes;" "what rosy lips;" "what plump cheeks;" but how seldom is the remark made, "what a fine nose!" Whenever the nose is spoken of, it is with a smile. No one ever talks seriously about it; few ever think of expatiating on its beauty. It is more than probable if our greatest poet should send a poem "on the nose" to the editor of a periodical, the latter would respectfully decline it, with the remark: "That's all very good, my dear sir, but then you know, it is on the nose, and that won't do at all."

The very terms we use in describing a man's nose tend to bring it into contempt and make us laugh. For instance, we say that a man has a pug nose, a parrot's nose, or a turned-up nose. Some thoughtless people designate it as a snout, a proboscis; while others, in speaking of a large nose, call it a promontory. A Frenchman says of a clever man, that he has a fine nose; of a proud man, that he carries his nose in the air; an inquisitive person is said to poke his nose everywhere; a gourmand is described as always having his nose in his plate; that of the scholar is said to be always in his books. When an individual is growing angry under provocation, the French say the mustard is rising to his nose. The English say of a man who does not form very decisive opinions—who is led by what others say rather than by his own judgment—that he is led by the nose. Others, who do themselves harm when trying to injure an enemy, are said to have cut off the nose to spite the face. And, in love affairs, when a rival has been supplanted, it is said that he has had his nose put out of joint.

A whole issue of our journal might be filled with the humorous allusions which have been made on the nose. From the very earliest time down to the present, it would seem as if there were a tacit agreement among mankind to make the nose a subject of jest. The following is a versification of a remark made on a man who not only had a very large nose, but large teeth also:

"Let Dick one summer's day expose
Before the sun his monstrous nose.
And stretch his giant mouth, to cause
Its shade to fall upon his jaws;
His nose so long and mouth so wide,
And those twelve grinders, side by side,
Then Dick, with very little trial,
Would make an excellent sun-dial."

The literal translation of the remark is: placing your nose opposite to the sun, and, opening your mouth, you will show the hour to all observers. A Greek poet describes the nose of a man as being so large that its distance prevented him from hearing himself sneeze.

Although the nose has been ridiculed through all the time, and held in contempt, yet the majority of the greatest men who have ever lived have been noted for large noses. The Romans had a proverb: "It is not common to every one to have a nose;" meaning that it was not every one who could boast of a prominent nasal appendage, or, to speak more plainly, have an expressive nose. Cyrus the Great had a long, sharp nose; and the Persians of the present day, in order that they may resemble, in one particular, at least, their great warrior, pinch their noses to resemble his. Cicero was called the orator with the equivocal nose. Julius Cæsar had an aquiline nose; so had Achilles; but the nose of the old philosopher, Socrates, it is said to relate, was a decided pug.

It is almost needless to say that the nose enters very largely into the matter of personal beauty. All writers on physiology and beauty lay great stress on the part it must take in the facial outline. Some call it the regular of all the features. One claims it should be one third the length from the tip of the chin to the roots of the hair; and, if there is any deviation from this rule, it must be an excess, for it would be better to have too large a nose than one too small. Plato called the aquiline the royal nose; and from the fact that the subjects of most of the early sculptors and painters were represented as having large noses, we may judge that they preferred them to small ones. But tastes differ; for, among the Kalmucks, a dumpy nose is considered the perfection of beauty. The Hottentots, among other heathenish customs, flatten the noses of their offspring; and the Chinese consider a nose of no account unless it be short and thick. The Crim Tartars do worse than this—they break the nose of their children because they consider them in the way of their eyes.

California Wine.—Among the most extensive wine cellars if not the largest in our city, is that of G. Groezinger, N. W. corner Battery and Pine streets, running nearly the entire block. Wines from all parts of the State are to be found in abundance in this vault Mr. Groezinger has agencies in New York, Chicago and other Western cities, which draw heavily on his stock here. Still he supplies our city and the Pacific coast with his different wines put up in cases or bulk, if so ordered. For private families, by the case or demijohn, he has a superior article of red wine for table use, like unto the Tinta Madeira a choice wine used in Europe; besides, fine old Port and white wine. Mr. Groezinger assures us that brandy, equal to the finest imported can be made here from the mountain grape. Success attend the undertaking.

Sawing and Planing Mills.—The most extensive Sawing and Planing Mills on the Pacific coast are those of the firm of D. A. Macdonald & Co., corner Market and Beale streets. There are four members comprising this firm, all practical men, namely, D. A. and J. H. Macdonald J. McGill and H. Chipman. Their employees number two hundred and upwards, and at the close of the day's work when the men leave the buildings for their homes, it reminds us of one of our Eeastern steamers discharging her passengers. A large capital is necessary to carry on so extensive an establishment, but the demaud for material for building purposes justifies such a large outlay of money and employ of hands. Adjoining of the main building is the sample rooms, where the different kinds of timber are assorted ready for sale to our City contractors and builders. as well as for the interior trade.

Merchant Tailors.—Zeitska & Sheppard have opened at No. 610 Clay street, a few doors north of Montgomery, where the latter gentleman was established in the same business in 1853. Both of these gentlemen are old forty niner's, and experienced cutters. They make to order gentlemen's wearing apparel of the latest London, Paris or New York styles. If you wish to be sure of perfect fitting suits of any description of goods call and leave your orders with them.

Italian Restaurant.—This restaurant was open to the public last week by Messrs Coco & Tovolara, who are well known to their countrymen as caterers in different restaurants in San Francisco for years. Wine is given both for breakfast and dinner, making an entire breakfast or dinner, composed of Italian dishes, for the moderate sum of 50 cents. The location of the Italian Restaurant is 540 Commercial stree, one door below Montgomery, east side. A most convenient locality to our principal thoroughfare.

New Printing Firm.—Mr. Wm. M. Cubery (recently of Sterett & Cubery) has, in connection with Mr. F. W. Van Reynegom, established a Book and Job Printing House at 536 Market street, directly opposite Second street, under the firm name of Cubery & Co. Residents in that section of the city wishing to call in the aid of the "Printer's Art" can rely upon procuring good work at the lowest rates, by leaving their orders with Cubery & Co.

Meagher, Taaffe & Co., have made a further reduction in certain articles of Dry Goods. See their advertisement.

Sash Doors etc.—Wm. O. Breyfogle has increased his facilties for turning out Sash, Doors, Blinds and Shutters. Contractors and Builders, both in the City and Country, will find it to their interest t leave their orders at his establishment No. 26 California street—Country orders attended to and delivered punctually.

Poison Oak.—The effects of this pestiferous shrub are now most virulent. Dr. Bourne's method is the only reliable cure. No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. *

Cures Guaranteed to the sick in almost all cases (without medicine, mesmerism, jugglery, or any species of fraud or deception) by Dr. Bourne No. 10 Masonic Temple. *

MY DREAM.

LAST night I dreamed of you—
Ah! sweets if you only knew,
What scorn would arise in those beautiful eyes,
Those wonderful eyes of blue!

I dreamed that I held you close—
So close to this bosom, sweet,
That your billowy hair strayed over my breast,
And I felt your heart beat.

Your cheeks were so temptingly near,
And your lips were so temptingly red,
That I kissed them, over and over again,—
You hung your beautiful head,

And blushed like the veriest child,
Fair Rose—rare Rose of the North:
On your cheeks where the snow-drops and lilies grow,
Carnations and roses sprang forth.

What was it I read in your eyes?
'Twas the old, old story, sweet:
You loved me—I poured out my passionate soul
At your beautiful, beauiful feet.

Then come, my Beautiful, come
To this loyal heart o' mine!
O come, my Lily, my wee with Rose,
With those 'wildering eyes o' thine!

O come as came last night—
(I remember your eyes' soft gleam,)
Come, Heart o' my heart and love me now,
As you loved me in my dream!

A. N.

UNDER GREEK FIRE.

NEAR the foot of Mount Pentelicus, and a few miles distant from Athens, a tranquil little village lies in the heart of a thickly-wooded hollow; it is surrounded by olive trees of great age, and every flat-roofed cottage has its tiny vineyard attached to it, or at least its garden, containiug a pomegranite or fig tree, as the sole revenue of its possessor. In winter the Cephisus runs through it with that delicious sound of flowing water which is so refreshing in an arid climate, and in summer its dry bed, filled with sparkling pieces of white marble, is almost hid by the lovely rose laurels which cluster over it. In the centre of the village stands the little church, with its Byzantine arcbitecture, its ever-burning lamp, and its open door, through which at dawn, and again at sunset, soft clouds of incense are seen to roll, while the monotonous voice of the priest is heard chanting the old words that have echoed down to him through more than a thousand centuries. Near it is the fountaiu, where the peasant women come in their gracefnl Albanian dress with brown capote and long white veil, to fill the earthen jars they bear on their shoulders, and which, in shape, are precisely the same as those depicted on the vuces found in ancient tombs. Immediately behind the villiage is the great myrtle-clad mountain, whose marble qnarries have yielded up the treasures which to this day give life to the classic memories of Greece—and on the other side, it needs but to ascend a little rising ground to catch sight of these gleaming pillars of the Parthenon, which seems, when spiritualized by the effects of strong sunlight, like the pure white vision of some beavenly temple in the air.

This village is inhabited entirely by peasants; and what it was at the time when the events took place which we are about to record, it still is—the perfect type of an Attic villuge. Quietly and monotonously the simple life of its inhubitants has gone on since then; undisturbed by the storms and convulsious of the world without, which to them have been only like the faint sound of waves falling on an unseen shore; but they have especially remained unchanged in this respect, that to gratify their hatred of the Moslem they are prepared to do and to suffer now all that they did and suffered then.

In one of the best houses of the village, which, nevertheless, only consisted of one large room with an earthern floor, there lived an old man named Apostoli, with his son Constandi and his daughter Xantha. He was looked upon as a considerable proprietor, for he possessed two olive trees of his own and some beehives; and when he went, as all other men did, to smoke his pipe in front of the little café in the evening, a place was always reserved for him beside the pappas as the post of honor, although the good priest himself differed in no respect from the other villagers, excepting that he new the Liturgy of St. Basis by heart. Apostoli and his son had both taken arms against the Turks, and they possesed one gun between them, which had done good execution in the time of need. Xantha was fifteen, and beautiful as a Greek maiden of that age often is, with her long almond-shaped eyes, clear olive complexion, and splendid coils of dark hair, which, when left to hang loose, touched the ground at her feet. She wore it twisted round her little red fez, with three gold coins banging from it over her forehead, which constituted all the money that Apostoli and his fathers before him had ever possessed. The soft white veil with which she had been taught to cover the lower part of her face, leaving only the eyes visible, when she met any man, usually fell in graceful folds on her shoulders; her gray pelisse, of a thick woolen material embroidered with red, reached to her knees, and below this she wore a long white garment with wide hanging sleeves, which was confined at the waist by a silken scarf; red slippers covered her small brown feet: and thus attired in the identical dress which her dead mother and grandmother had worn before her, little Xantha looked as classical a figure as could well have been seen. It was a calm, hot summer evening, and, like all other women in the village, Xantha was seated on the ground, outside her own door, talking to the inhabitant of the next house, who was in a similar position. The contrast presented by these two neighbors was very singular, although their dress was precisely the same. Xantha was at the ripest hour of her young beauty, and Diamanta was not only the oldest woman in the village, but probably the oldest in Greece, for she bad numbered a hundred and twelve years, and looked the most withered wrinkled old mummy it is possible to imagine. It almost seemed as if she had been dried up to such a state of complete preservation that she must last forever; and there was no sign of life about her when her face was in repose, except the dim black eyes which looked out upon the world with an uncertain gaze, as though it were strange to them. She was speaking now, however, and the shrill, muffled voice seemed to come from a distance.

"Yes, corizi mou," (my daughter), she was saying, "it is as I tell you—the saints have forgotten me—I am tired of living, and they ought to have taken me years ago; but they have never troubled their heads about me, and it is very unkind of them, especially of Saint Dimitri; for it is I that have given him a taper on his feast-day every year, and let it burn down to the end, because he was my husband's name saint. He ought to remember me at least; but he don't—he can take Petrachi, the barber, who was only eighty, and Stamina, the papas' widow, who was not so much; but he can't think of me, oh, no!"

"Tell about your husband, mitera mou," (my mother,) said Xantha, interrupting the old woman's grumbling. "What was he like?"

"How should I remember? He has been dead a hundred years. I married him when I was eleven, and he died the year after."

"Dead a hundred years ago!" exclaimed Xantha, letting her distaff fall from her hand, "and you a widow all that time! But you can tell me if you liked him, surely; and if you were sorry when he died?"

"Not I, indeed! I know nothing about it. I married him because my father said I must do so, without my ever having seen him before the wedding day, as you will marry your bridegroom, poulaki mou, (my little bird,) when the time comes."

"But, mitera mou," said Xantha, still pursuing her researches into the history of the poor old worn-out heart that was beating so feebly now with the last remnant of life, "if you lived a whole year with your husband, you must remember if you grew to love him, and if it seemed to you when he died as if the sun had gone out, as I am sure it would to me?"

"I tell you, poulaki, I remember nothing about him. I knew I got the public mourners to come and shriek when he died, for I always done my duty, I did. But I don't care anything about it—I want to die, if only Saint Dimitri would act like a Christian, and take me?"

"Well, mitera mou, you are very old, I know," said Xantha with a sigh, "but I do not think if I lived even as long as you have done, I should wish to die. I should not like to have my best clothes put on me, and to be carried away to be hid under ground. I want to live; I do not want ever to die. Oh, life is sweet!"

"Ah, well," grumbled Diamanti, "you will not find it so pleasant when you have no teeth to eat even olives with, and when you cannot see whether it is a grape or a blue beetle you are putting in your mouth, as it happened to me yesterday." Just at this moment Apostoli came slowly up, pipe in hand, and told Xantha to come into the house, as he had something to say to her.

She obeyed, and the old man seated himself cross-legged on the divan, where a little square carpet formed his bed at night, while his daughter sat down on the ground at his feet. Apostoli smoked in silence for a few minutes with great solemnity, and then said:

"My daughter, you are now fifteen, are you not?"

"Yes, father; I began my sixteenth year on the feast of the sleep of the Virgin."

"It is a great age," said the old man, gravely; "you should have gone home to a husband last year, but I have been so occupied with these accursed Turks that I have neglected my duty to you; however, it is all settled now. I have found you a bridegroom, and you will be married next week."

Xantha started violently, while the sudden color dyed her face with as rich a glow as that which blushes over Hymettus when is sinking.

"O, my futher, no!" she exclaimed. "I do not wish to marry."

Apostoli took his pipe out of his mouth, and stared at her in utter amazement.

"Xantha, have you slept under the moon and gone mad, that you speak such words? You ought to hide your face for shame that you are not married already; but there will be no more delay now; your godfather and godmother are preparing your crown, and the papas has promised to have the wedding next Sunday."

"But who is the bridegroom, father?" asked Xantha, clasping her hands with a movement of pain.

"Xantha, is that a proper question for you to ask?" said Apostoli, severely. "What bad spirit is come to you today?"

The young girl bent down her head in silence, tears dropping from her eyes.

"You can ask me, if you like, what I intend to give you for your portion, and you will see you have a good father. I have promised that you are to have three beehives and your mother's clothes. The bridegroom's father is to give two olive trees and the house furnished. Ah! it is a good bargain"—and he stroked his head in a self-satisfied manner.

"Do I know the bridegroom's father?" asked Xantha, with apparent unconcern.

"No; you have never seen him; he is the demark of Keffesia," said the old man, falling into the trap, "and Manelaki is his only son; so he is willing to do great things for him. Now, my little bird, I have told you thus early of your wedding in order that you may have time to get the sweetmeats ready, and the gold threads to mix with your hair; and it may be as well to have your eyebrows and eyelids painted to-morrow; but your godmother will see to all that—she is coming as soon as the sun rises."

While he spoke Costandi came through the garden and into the house with the peculiarly haughty, almost insolent bearing which the Greek peasant is so apt to assume. He had the delicate profile and short upper lip of his race, and was a fine-looking youth, full of energy and vigor—strangely different, indeed, to what he was later in life, when he was known to the writer as a worn, moody, restless man who wandered about in the deadly sunshine when everyone else was sleeping, as if haunted by fatal memories that would not die.

"I have told Xanthoula," said Apostoli, addressing him, "that the bridegroom you know of is coming for her on Sunday."

"Ah, it is time, indeed," said Costandi. "I am ashamed to see her still in her father's house. There is not a maiden in the village so old as she is, and unmarried. You should have seen to it earlier, patera mou."

"Is it my fault? Could I bring bridegrooms down from heaven when they had all gone off to fight with these dogs of Turks? But we shall soon see her taken home now. Xantha, are you dreaming that you do not fill your brother's chibouki? Do not you see that he is waiting for it?"

Xantha had been sitting with her eyes hidden in her hands; she now rose with a heavy, sullen look on her beautiful, face, and, dragging her feet slowly along, went to fill Costandi's pipe.

Soon the family prepared to go to rest for the night, and as it was extremely hot Apostoli and his son took their carpets from the divan which formed their couch in colder weather, and went out to sleep in the garden. Xantha had already lain down on a mat near the door, and appeared to be sunk in a profound slumber. There was, in reality, however, no sleep under those long eyelashes wet with tears; and the wild beating of her heart might almost have been heard in the intense stillness that soon fell on all around. For an hour or two the Greek girl lay perfectly still; then cautiously she sat up and listened, with her large dark eyes glancing from side to side like those of a young fawn when it fears an enemy. There was not a sound, however, except the little green frogs chirping in the trees, and the perpetual creaking noise of the cigala. At last she rose—laid aside her slippers—gathered her veil over her face, and stole out of the house. She passed her father and brother, who lay buried in deep sleep, with the utmost caution, and then with a swift and noiseless step, her naked feet scarcely touching the ground, she fled away through the village, and out into the olive grove beyond, never stopping till she reached a spot in the center of the wood, marked by the traces of some very ancient ruins. Here she paused. Her feet, though she knew it not, were on the site of a temple once dedicated to Pallas, while, at a little distance from her, were the remains of a chapel which bore the evidences of four different epochs unmistakably on its crumbling walls.

But there was only one good in heaven or in earth for Xantha in that hour, and she was waiting for it now with longing eyes and parted lips, and hands clasped tight to still the throbbing of her heart. Soon the sound which was the music of life to her came faintly on the air. She heard the galloping of a horse coming ever nearer and nearer towards her. Now her eyes grew larger with joyful excitement, her chest heaved, her breathing became short and hurried—nearer and nearer—through the trees she can discern the beautiful Arab mare that was bearing to her the desire of her heart, and in another moment the horseman was at her side. He flung himself to the ground and caught her in his arms, while she let her head fall on his breast with a faint cry of delight.

But now the terror and the curse of Xantha's fate is seen, for the lover whom the Greek maiden has welcomed with such rapture is a Turk! A noble-looking man, indeed; but a Turk wearing a green turban, which marked him as a descendant of Mahomet, and a scimentar which had often been reddened by the blood of Greeks.

"Oh, Achmet!" she said, as they sat down together at the foot of an olive tree, "it is well that we were to meet to-night, for you must save me now, or it will be too late forever." And she shuddered, squeezing her little hands into his as if she wanted him to hold her safe from the grasp of others.

"What has happened?" he said, drawing her nearer to him.

"My father is going to bring a bridegroom on Sunday to take me away!"

"A bridegroom!" said Achmet, scoffingly. "I am your bridegroom, Xanthoula, and none other shall you have."

"I know it, Achmet mou—I would rather die than go with another; but what shall I do when my father brings him to marry me? Oh, don't let him take me away!"

"Fear nothing, my little bird, he shall never come near you, for you must do now what should have been done long ago. You must come with me to my strong tower in Negropoint, where you will be safe for the present, and then, when I can get a ship, I will take you to Stamboul, where you shall live in my harem and do nothing to amuse yourself all day long.

"Oh, Achmet, if only you were a Greek!" she said, putting her arms round his neck.

"Can you not love me as I am—Xantha, can you not?" he answered, holding back her head that he might look into her eyes.

"I do, I do, better than life; but my father—my brother—if they were ever to know I had gone away with a Turk!" And she shuddered from head to foot.

"They will never know it, angelaki mou—(my little angel;) you must come with me now—at once. My good Arab will have placed you in safety before they have awakened to miss you. Come, my thrice beloved—light of heart—we must not delay another instant."

He rose, and drew Xantha to her feet. She stood for a moment trembling and changing color, her eyes full of tears, her lips quivering; her country, her religion, her father, were straining on the chords that bound them to her heart—while before her was the face which was the sun of her existence.

"Choose, Xantha," said Achmet, who was watching her keenly: "if you do not come with me now, you will never see me again."

With a cry she flung herself into his arms.

"Achmet mou, you must be my home, my country my all!"

Without a word he lifted her on the horse, took his seat behind her, and in another moment they were flying through the olive grove as if the beautiful Arab had wings to his feet.

Xantha was missed as soon as her father and brother awoke, for it was a circumstance so unprecedented that a Greek peasant girl should be absent from her home, that it excited alarm and suspicion at once. Costandi went without delay into the village to try and obtain some tidings of her, and in the course of an hour he came back to his father with his face so transformed by furious passion that the old man rose appalled from his seat, and could only gasp out "My daughter!"

"Your daughter and my sister no more, father," said Costandi, grinding his teeth. "The accursed woman has given herself to Achmet, the Turk—yes, the Turk!—and has gone with him to his home!"

The old man gave a cry almost like that of a wild beast when his pray is torn from him.

"It cannot be—it cannot be," he groaned out; "that son of a dog may have carried her off, but she has not consented.

"She has," said his son. He came up to Apostoli, and spoke in a voice of deep passion. "Listen, father; the papas met them in the olive grove—she was on the horse in front of the Turk. The priest thought she was being stolen away, and he caught the bridle, and besought that hound to give her up to him; then Xantha—Xantha, father!—turned and put her arms around the Turk, and said she would never leave him—she would go with him wherever he went; she was his own, his wife.

Apostoli stopped his ears. "Enough," he said. He sat down on the divan, his face changing to a livid hue and a dark expression of concentrated rage and hate. At last he stretched out his right hand and said: "Let her be anathema!"

"It is not enough only to curse her, father," said Costandi, very slowly. The old man looked up and met his son's eyes. He understood the meaning they expressed, and his ghastly face became convulsed in the agony of the terrible conflict of feeling that was rending his heart. Costandi continued to meet his imploring gaze unflinchingly. At last the old man, in a faint, broken voice, whispered: "My son, must it be?"

"Father, are you a Greek, and do you ask me?" With a groan Apostoli drew his capote over his head, laid his face on his arms, and remained motionless. Costandi took his gun from the corner of the room and went out.

It was night once more—sweet, beautiful and calm as that which had witnessed Xantha's final apostacy to her country and her faith; and the solemn loveliness of the hour was even more exquisite in the pine-grove of Sooli, where she now enjoyed it, than in the familiar scene where she beheld it last This grove lies along one side of the plain of Marathon, in the shade of the mountains that encircle it, and forms the only break in that wide expanse whose edge is washed by the rippling waves, with the exception of the tumulus in the centre, where the bones of the long-remembered heroes yet rest in peace.

The sea was lying now under the soft starlight like a sheet of molten silver, serene as the cloudless sky that looked down on the calm scene of ancient strife; and the hush and stillness in the air were so complete that one might have well fancied one could have heard, according to the old tradition, the phantom horses of the Persians neigh in their agony, and the shouts of the Greeks as they rushed to their death. Within the pine grove the shadows lay soft and deep, but there was light enough for little Xantha to busy herself in preparing a repast for her lover with the provisions which he had carried off from a luckless Greek peasant, whom he had met on the mountain-path going home with a well-laden donkey. Achmet had brought Xantha to this spot to rest till the heat of the day was over, and they intended to resume their journey in an hour or two. Xantha was moving about with a light step and a sunny smile, arranging the grapes and bread and the skin of wine at the foot of a tree, where her lord could recline at ease. She had given herself up for the time to the intoxicating sweetness of the love she no longer cared to conceal; they were together, free and alone, and she had flung out from her heart all thought of Greece in its oppression, and her father in his anger and misery. Achmet was with her, and what was all the world beside to her? This, she felt, was the crowning hour of her life, the best, the sweetest; and true it is that the brightest and loveliest hour of day is often that over which the sun casts his last rainbow-tinted rays before he leaves the world to gloom and night.

Presently Xantha discovered that the wooden water-bottle which Achmet carried slung from his saddle, was empty, and that it must be replenished as much for the sake of the horse as for their own. The Turk at once said that he knew there was a little mountain stream not very far up the hill-side, where he would go to fill it; and smiling at Xantha's entreaties that he would come back as quickly as he could, he swung the bottle over his shoulder, and disappeared among the trees. Still she busied herself in preparations for his comfort, and at last having made every arrangement she could think of that was likely to please him, she went and stood quietly leaning against a tree, with her beautiful, bright face turned in the direction from which she expected to see her lover return. After a little time her ear detected a footstep, coming toward her; she leaned eagerly forward, calling out in a joyous tone—"Achmet, my thrice beloved, are you come?"—and a voice, a voice she knew too well, answered, hoarse with rage—"Accursed woman! it is I who have come!"

The arms stretched out to embrace her lover fell at her side; her large eyes, dilated with unutterable terror, became fixed and glassy; her lips refused to form even a cry for help; frozen with the awful pressage of her fate, she stood like a statue, awaiting the approach of the avenger. Soon, from among the trees, her brother appeared, and stopped a few paces from her, where the full starlight fell upon his cruel, inexorable face. Slowly he raised his gun, then a wild shriek burst from the unhappy girl; she fell on her knees and clasped her hands.

"Amaun! amaun!" she cried, in a voice of stifled agony. This word, which means simply mercy, is a Turkish expression; but it is currently used in Greece, and another time it would not have been remembered from what language it was taken: now, if anything could have added to Costandi's implacable wrath this would have done it.

"You do well to ask mercy in Turkish; it is a fitting word to be the last on the lips of a false-hearted Greek; and now, in your own blood, will I wash out the stain of your infamy! He fired, as he spoke, with a sure and steady aim. Xantha, struck to the heart, fell over on her side; and on her beautiful face, upturned to the starlight, death stamped the seal of its mysterious calm, effacing forever the look of horror and fear which had marred its loveliness in the last awful moment of consciousness.

Costandi drew near and looked at her, not to mourn the fair young life he had destroyed, but to assure himself that the work was well and surely done, and that the child of their common parents could be false to Greece no more. Then, when he had fully satisfied himself that Achmet would find only a corpse where he had left a form of living beauty, and a heart beating with love, he turned calmly from the spot and disappeared among the trees.

Costandi lived many long years after Greece had become free, and the Moslem driven from her fairest possessions. He may be living still—posaibly he is one of those old men, of whom we have heard, who have renewed their youth in the cause of Crete, and are even now fighting hand to hand, with their ancient foes on her shore.

SENSATIONS OF THE DYING.

THE popular ideas relative to the sufferings of persons on the point of death are undoubtedly, to a certain extent, erroneous. The appearance of extreme agony which is often presented under these circumstances is due to mere muscular agitation' independent of any extraordinary sensibility of the nerves of feeling. Those who die a natural death, in the very last stages of existence are scarcely conscious of bodily suffering—not more than they frequently are to the attentions and solicitude of friends.

Those who die by violence or accidents, undoubtedly experience a degree of pain proportionate to the extent of the bodily mutilation. Hanging is doubtless an unpleasant mode of death; but few, after all, "shuffle of this mortal coil", more easily than those who are suspended by the neck. It is akin to drowning in this respect. The blood immediately seeks the head, and soon deprives it of all consciousness. The efforts to inhale the air, which are kept up for some time after the cord is attached, and which cause such violent movements of the chest and extremities, arise from the influence of the spinal marrow, whose sensibility is not so soon destroyed by the congestion of blood as that of the brain. Persons who die by decapitation most probably suffer more, though their pain is only momentary; this is the case with those who blow out their brains The sensation produced by a ball passing through the body would be difficult to describe by one who has never experienced it; but it is something singular in this case that those who are shot, although the "leaden messenger of death" may not have penetrated any essentially vital organ, immediately fall to the earth, apparently under an irresistible feeling of their approaching return to dust, exclaiming, as it were, involuntarily, "I am a dead man!"

A dagger wound in the heart, for the few moments which are consumed in the ebbing of life, must occasion unutterable feelings of agony, independent of the mere sensation of pains in the parts sundered by the entrance of the blade. The rushing out of the blood at each convulsive pulsation of the heart must seem like the actual spectacle of the flow of life.

Those who are crushed to death may not expire instantly, unless the cranium happens to be involved in the casualty. Where the skull is not fractured there is probably an inconceivable agony for a few seconds—a flushing thought of home, friends and family, and all is over. Those who are cut in two by a heavily burdened railroad carriage must experience some similiar sensations.

If the neck is broken low down, the person does not necessarily die on the instant. His situation is the most distressing perhaps of any which can be imagined. He may live and have a being for days; but he cannot move. His face may express all the passions, feelings and emotions; but beyond the motions of his breast and countenance, his energies do not go. His arms are pinioned to his side; his legs are lifeless; and he essentially beholds his body in the grave, while he is yet in the full possession of his faculties. The least disturbance of his position is liable to launch him into eternity.

In taking laudanum, a person exists in a state of insensibility for a length of time, a melancholy spectacle to his friends. In poisoning from arsenic, a great amount of suffering is undergone. The sensibility of the stomach is exceedingly acute when inflamed; and the effect of arsenic is to produce a fatal inflammation of this viscus. Prussic acid is rapid, and acts by paralyzing the brain.

In reflecting on the horrors which death presents under these different aspects of violence, the mind becomes satiated with disgust. We cannot do better than turn to the contemplation of its features in the milder course of disease, where, if the mind be at ease, the final exit is made without any of those revolting exhibitions of bodily suffering.

A LETTER from Naples mentions the following curious fact: "Lately, while excavations were being made at Pompeii, in presence of several persons of distinction, the workmen discovered a bronze vase, hermetically closed and enveloped in a thick crystalized crust, that having been broken and the lid raised, the interior of the vessel was found to contain a considerable quantity of water. As no marks of oxydation appeared within the vase, some persons present ventured to drink some of the liquid, and all unanimously agreed in pronouncing it clear, fresh, and of remarkable softness. As the destruction of Pompeii by the ashes of Vesuvius dates from the year 79 of our era, the water in question has been preserved for nearly 1,800 years."

ENVY ought in strict truth to have no place whatever allowed it in the heart of man; for the goods of this present world are so vile and low that they are beneath it; and those of the future world are so vast and exalted that they are above it.

ANCIENT MANUSCRIPTS.—The most ancient manuscripts are written without accents, stops or separation between the words, nor was it until after the ninth century that copyist began to leave space between words.

THE world's experience preaches in vain, every man thinking him self an exception to all general rules.

THF PURITY OF THE LANGUAGE.

WE think that there is such a thing as an unwise and excessive conservatism in regard to innovations in the forms and usages of the language. Many of the freshest and finest productions of American writers during the last few years, many of those that evince the highest degree of originality and vital power, and that seem to herald the dawn of a genuine and distinctive national literature that shall be neither an imitation nor an echo, are not written in what the fuical purists are accustomed to style "classical English." The introduction of new words, phrases and idioms, variously classed as vulgarism, provincialisms, and slang, though regarded with such sensitive horror by pedagogues and small critics, is inevitable in every living language; and notwithstanding the clamorous protests of predants and grammarians it may admit of grave doubt whether such new coinages are to be pronounced an evil. There is some reason for believing that if the sticklers for classical correctness in style and expression were to have their way, and put under ban every homebread phrase freshly transferred from the talk of the people into literature, every collection of words and every idiom not sanctioned by the usage of the writers who are held to imitation as the best models of English composition, everything in short, that can be called "an Americanism," our language would become stilted and bookish, and degenerate into mere diction so as to be no more a fit vehicle for the living thought of the age and country and for giving adequate expression to our national individuality than Latin or Greek would be. Addison and Steele, doubtless wrote pure and classical English, and so did King James' translators of the Bible, but the language has changed, and we venture to think improved, as much since the era of the Spectator and the Tatler, as it did during the period that elapsed between the reign of King James and that of Queen Anne. After all, there is a certain higher law of language, not to be found in the text books of grammar and rhetoric, by virtue of which its forms never can become fixed and rigid until it ceases to be the actual speech of a people—by virtue of which, so long as it is a living tongue the speaking usage continually affects and modifies the writing usage, so that in the course of a period longer or shorter, according to the conditions of each particular case, the books of one generation become unfamiliar and uncouth, if not positively unintelligible to a succeeding one. There are few of us who can read Chaucer, or even Shakspeare, without feeling the necessity of frequent recourse to a glossary, and the time will probably come when Swinburne and Tennyson, Longfellow and Whittier will seem equally old-fashioned to the student of a future generation. Nor is this gradual change and progress a thing to be deplored. It is more desirable that the language of literature should receive fresh accessions from the common speech of the people, than that the latter should become formal, bookish, and precise. The former process imparts force and vigor; the latter tends to take away picturesqueness and color. Every one must have often observed in the conversation of uneducated persons of natural shrewdness and observation, a peculiar description and narrative power such as is self attained by men of literary culture—a quality at which Lowell hints when he says of "Uncle Reuben's" story:

> "I could not give his language where through ran
> The gamy flavor of the bookless man,
> Who shapes a word before the fancy cools."

It is Scott's marvellous skill in initiative, or rather perhaps in reproducing pithy idiomatic language of the common people, that gives such unrivalled vigor and spirit to his dialogue, and occasionally to his narrative when put into the mouth of one of his characters. The story of "Wandering Willie" the blind fiddler in "Red Gauntlet," and the conversation of old Peter Peebles in the same novel, are stifling instances of this. Upon the whole, we are not sorry to observe that the fear of the schoolmaster who feels bound to take up the battle-axe in favor of "pure English" and to make war against home-bred phrases and idioms, is not as strong with the rising generation of authors as it was with their predecessors, and we shall neither be greatly surprised nor afflicted if the next "Dictionary of Americanisms" shall be found to contain twice as many pages as the last.

THE PRESS AND THE POLITICIANS.

ONE of the "lessons" that may be learned from the nomination of Mr. Gorham for the office of Governor, would seem to be that the Press is, so far from being omnipotent in political matters that the politicians can, under certain conditions, contemn and defy it. Whatever its power may be in a canvass before the people, it seems to possess scarcely any for influencing the preliminary arrangements of party managers, the making of slates and the selection of candidates. These matters are controlled by a few men who make the practical part of politics their business, and who, disdaining theories and theorists, possess a skill in managing the political machinery by which legislators and governors are made, that seems like jugglery to the uninitiated.

For many weeks past, a very large portion of the Press of this state has been urging the claims of Mr. Bidwell for Governor, while we know of but one or two papers that openly advocated the cause of Mr. Gorham. The latter, moreover, was energetically opposed by the four leading papers of the State. Naturally enough, that portion of the public that derive their notions of politics from the newspapers, supposed that the last named gentleman had no chance of success, and by many it was even doubted whether he was to be regarded as a serious candidate. But while the "leading journals" were declaiming about the candidates, the managing politicians, concerning themselves little as to what the editors and writers might say or leave unsaid, gave their whole attention to those practical details that have a vast deal more to do with securing party nominations than any quantity of "able leaders." Mr. Gorham's friends did their work well and thoroughly, but so quietly, at the same time, that it was not until just on the eve of the meeting of the Convention, that the general public became aware that he was a formidable candidate. The result shows clearly, that a few sharp and experienced "workers" can accomplish more toward securing a party nomination than a powerful newspaper combination.

AN UNJUSTIFIABLE ATTACK.—A weekly paper, ostensibly devoted to sporting matters, but which appears lately to have lent itself to parties wishing to avail themselves of a vehicle for personal attacks dictated by interested or malicious motives, has recently published a very long article entitled "The Sutter Street Railroad Company" which is in reality a series of charges against a private citizen, The whole subject matter of the attack, is of a purely business character, and one that the public is not the proper tribunal to decide; and no person of ordinary sagacity can fail to see at a glance that the article referred to is simply a prejudiced and ex parte statement, in regard to a business controversy, prepared by one of the parties to that controversy, the publication of which as an editorial, is a violation of respectable journalistic usage. If any portion of the stockholders of a street railroad company are in favor of a change in the board of directors, the best mode of accomplishing the object is not to procure the publication of articles on the subject in the newspapers. Such a course, is especially objectionable, when, as in the present case, the appeal to the public is unfair and one sided, besides being bitter in spirit, coarse in manner, and abounding in distorted statements of alleged facts.

THE Monitor makes a mild reply to our comments upon the tone of its strictures upon Bishop Kip, and undertakes to justify the coarseness of its attack upon the ground that the Episcopal Bishop was the aggressor, he having characterized the Church of Rome in his address to the Episcopal Convention, as "a gigantic system of superstition." The Bishop had a perfect right, in addressing his own clergy, to speak of the Church of Rome in any terms which he deemed just. He was not speaking to the public at large, and Roman Catholics have no just ground of offence in his language.

MUCH INTEREST and curiosity are felt as to the course which the Bulletin, Alta, and the Sacramento Union will pursue in reference to the nomination of Gorham for Governor. The course pursued by those papers has been such as to make it an exceedingly awkward business for them to support him, and yet it is difficult to see how they can bolt the nomination without losing their status as Union organs. The Times has promptly signified its adhesion to the "powers that be," by placing the nominations of the Sacramento Convention at the head of its columns.

ALL THE journals that have strong Democratic leanings and yet hesitate from prudential considerations openly to espouse the Democratic cause, seem to be peculiarly anxious for the nomination of Gen. Rosecranz as the candidate of that party for the office of Governor. Such a nomination would furnish a neat and graceful bridge by which persons who would like to help the Copperhead cause without incurring the odium that attaches to it, can pass over to their friends.

THE NEW YORK Herald has hit upon a plan of reconstruction which will, it thinks, speedily restore harmony between the North and the South. This novel plan is for the Democrats to nominate a presidential ticket consisting of Gen. Grant for President and Gen. Lee for Vice President.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

AT Maguire's Opera House the Martinetti ballet and pantomime season closes to-night with The Night Owl. On Monday the Young American tragedian, Edwin Adams of whom we have heard such good accounts from the East, will commence an engagement, opening in Hamlet. The public will greet with joy the restoration of the legitimate drama to the stage of Maguire's Opera House which has been for too long a time given up to "Fanchons," legs and pantomime. Now we may hope for something which will appeal to the intellect, as well as to the heart and the eyes. Everyone of cultivated taste must hope that Edwin Adams will prove acceptable to the public of San Francisco.

At the Academy of Music the De Lave Family of acrobats and gymnasts made their appearance on Thursday to a crowded house. The most daring feats performed by the Japanese are certainly excelled by the perilous leaps of the brave little Lilla and Zoe. The tight rope ascension from the stage to the gallery, made by M. De Lave, is a wonderful and graceful performance. The De Lave family have made an immense hit Our fickle public have quite given up their quondam pets, the Japanese, and now worship the young female gymnasts.

The usual matinee will take place at Maguire's Opera House, and at the Academy of Music the De Lave troupe will give one of their wonderful performances at 2 P. M. today.

The engagement of the Great Dragon Troupe of Japanese at the Metropolitan Theater closes to-night, and on Tuesday they will proceed to the East.

MRS LAURA CUPPY has returned from Stockton and will deliver a lecture on "Isms" to-morrow evening at Mechanics' Institute Hall.

TOUCHSTONE.

POLITICS AND PHILOSOPHY.—So far as abstract questions are concerned, there can, of course, be no compromise between right and wrong. But what is inadmissible in theory is often wise and necessary in practice. So far as theory is concerned, we look for ideal perfection; but in practice we must often be content, temporarily at least, with what is practicable and attainable, Precisely at this point commences the difference between the philosopher and the statesman. The former deals with theories and principles, the latter, with measures. Expediency, circumstances, and present surroundings which are not admitted as elements in the calculations of the one, have a powerful influence with the other. In politics there can be no real issue in regard to principles—at least no practical issue; for such an issue can only arise when the abstract ideas and philosophical theories of hostile parties have been reduced to the shape of practical measures. Votes cannot be taken, nor political campaigns conducted upon abstract issues, or questions of principle unassociated with proposed measures. Every political party is, indeed, in some sense, the embodiment of an idea, but that idea must find embodiment in a shape that has reference to action.

Simple as these propositions may seem, it is from not perceiving their truth that much of the acrimony of our political warfare springs. Practical politicians, who wish to do the best that circumstances and the nature of the case will admit for the time being, misunderstand the theorists whom they denounce as visionaries, abstractionists, radicals, etc., and are in turn misunderstood by them. Thus, men of strong convictions, like Thaddeus Stevens, Wendall Phillips, and Charles Sumner, are prone to accuse practical statesmen who are content to aim at what is attainable, of sacrificing principle to expediency, and the cases are exceedingly rare where either of these diverse orders of mind is capable of doing justice to the other.

THE FOURTH OF JULY. — The probabilities are that the coming anniversary of our National Independence will be very generally celebrated. The subscriptions are coming in quite freely, by the aid of the active and earnest endeavors of the Collection Committee; the societies are responding cheerfully to the invitations extended to them to participate in the procession, and all things look favorable for a good old-fashioned celebration. Of course, the grand display of fireworks will wind up the day's festivities, and we trust that some appropriate place may be chosen for their display, so that the public may not find themselves gathered in their rear inhaling their smoke and the villainous odor of saltpetre with no chance of seeing them, as was the case last year.

Would not the Western side of Telegraph Hill, just above the line of Kearny street, from Filbert to Greenwich streets, be a suitable place? The location is elevated, and affords an extended range of vision from Washington Square, and the whole Northern and Western portions of the city; besides the prevailing western winds would blow the smoke away over the hill to the leeward without it intercepting the vision. If we must pay for fireworks let the public have the best opportunity possible to see them.

WOODWARD'S GARDENS.—An immense number of visitors flock to these lovely gardens every day. There so many attractions that everyone is pleased. Many a cosy little picnic takes place under the shady bowers.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ADDRESS.

BY JOHN QUILL.

[One of the invariable characteristics of genius, is its tendency to provoke imitation. The following, evidently had its inspiration in "Mark Twain's" "Bad Little Boy," and would in all probability have never been written had not its author seen appreciated, and admired its prototype.]

THEY had a Sunday school stereopticon exhibition up town last week, and after the pictures were all shown, the superintendent asked me to address the children, I spoke about as follows: "I shan't say very much to the little boys and girls here to-day, because I havn't got much to say. Although I used to be a little boy and girl myself a great many years ago, I don't think of anything that would interest them just now. You remember that beautiful picture you have just seen of Elijah and the bad boys. Elijah had a bald head, and these wicked boys made a good deal of fun of him, and called him hard names. and before they could think almost, two bears came out of the woods and eat them right up. Now this should be a warning to you never to holler at a bald-headed man when you see him, but to just go up quietly to him, like a little gentleman, and tell him he ought to buy a wig. Or, if your father is a barber, ask him to please buy some hair restorative. Never holler at him, and make fun of him, for wherever there is a bald head there's most always more or less bare about somewhere.

Of course you all read your library books that you get from Sunday school, and you like them very much. Now you've noticed how the good boys in them always die before they grow up and have half a chance at enjoying life. It's my belief that good boys always do die young, for I can't go back on the Sunday school books. Therefore I don't want to advise you to be good, for you'll certainly die, and as I don't care to have you die, I'd recommend you to go in and get wicked. Most any insurance company will insure your life if you're wicked. For they can afford to do it, you see. And you must always be careful, my dear children, to love your relations. You boys ought to be very kind to your little sisters. I once knew a bad boy who struck his sister a blow over the eye, although she didn't slowly fade away and die in the early summer time, when the June roses were blowing, with words of sweet forgiveness on her pallid lips, she rose up and hit him over the head with a rolling pin, so that he couldn't go to Sunday school for more than a month on account of not being able to put his best hat on. So love your little sisters, I say. I never had a little sister of my own, but I recolleet that I went out once and loved another man's sister, but she had a wicked father, and he hurt me very much helping me off his front door-steps. But you ought to love them, and always obey your father and mother. If your father tells you to do a thing and your mother tells you not to, it don't make any difference, you've got to obey them both. I'll leave it to the superintendent if the Bible don't say so.

You ought to love your teachers very much, too, and reverence them. When I went to school the boys used to love the teacher so much that they couldn't bear for him to even go out for a minute, and they put shoemaker's wax on his chair, so as to hold him down. And the teacher said he would never desert us, never, never, but he would always stick to us. And then he used to get down a club, about four feet long with a ferule on it, and do more sticking than we thought was necessary. He was a good teacher, though, and once when I asked him if he would whip me for a thing I didn't do, he said "no," and then I told him I hadn't done my sums. But he said he believed he'd change his mind, and then he flogged me like the very nation. Still we loved that teacher, and when he died, the boys were so glad to see that he had a handsome coffin, that they fairly shouted for joy.

And, my dear children, let me caution you against the sin of letting your angry passions rise. Fighting is a bad business. Dr. Watts, you know says:

> "Let dogs delight to bark and bite,
> For 'tis their nature to:
> But Satan will find some work
> For idle hands to do."

Fighting is very wicked, indeed. A few years ago I knew a boy who was squaring off and daring people to fight him, and saying he could lick them, more or less, all the time. And what became of this wretched boy? Why, one day he dared a fellow to knock a chip off his shoulder, and the fellow knocked it, and did much more knocking beside, so that the boy was taken deathly sick, and couldn't budge out of his bed for six weeks. So that the boy actually wished he had never seen that particular chip, in the whole course of his life. But he went around and bought a brass-barreled pistol, and got some other boys to make a secret society, and draw up a constitution. And they all swore to have revenge. But nothing much ever came of it, for the fellow who knocked off the chip was a big boy, and, of course, so fast as the society boys grew big, he grew bigger, so they thought perhaps they'd better let him alone.

Another thing, boys, I want to caution you against, and that is ever going to the theater or the circus. I know boys who always go to see the show and creep in under the tent. But they generally come to bad ends, and a tiger or a hyena, or some wild animal or other is absolutely certain to rush out and grab them by the trowsers sooner or later. So be very careful to keep away from all such places and go to Sunday school regularly. Why, I recollect just as distinctly as if it had been to-morrow, a boy who ran away one Sunday morning and instead of going to school, he went a boating on the river, and he hadn't been gone long before a fearful storm came—which wouldn't have come if he had gone to Sunday school—and the boat was upset and this miserable boy was nearly drowned. But now listen to the result. Ah! my dear children, wickedness is always punished, and this boy got to hate water so much that he never drank a drop afterward that he couldn't help, and he used to drink rum, and he died and filled a drunkard's grave.

This was wrong, and so it is to smoke and chaw tobacco, I had a second cousin who went out and got a chaw of tobacco when he was a boy, and he came home and chawed it, and he sat down by the stove and he got sicker and sicker and whiter and whiter, and when his fond mother asked him what was the matter with him, he said he guessed he must have taken a slight cold, and than he went out and threw up with this wicked lie upon his lips.

It never works to be a bad boy, but if all you children mind what I am saying to you, you'll never be bad boys, and I don't believe the girls will ever anyhow. But mind you mustn't be too good. Casabianca was too good and he died miserably. George Washingto was good and he died, and all the good boys that ever lived died. So you'd better be just a little good, and when you grow up maybe you'll get to be President. The girls, of course, won't, but I suppose some of them maybe can go to congress by that time, and then you can blacken one another's characters as much as you've a mind to.

AN ANCIENT BREACH OF PROMISE.

A CURIOUS instance of a lady availing herself, in 1540, of the right to appear by champion in a "breach of promise of marriage" case, is mentioned in the memoirs of Marochal de Villeville. The husband of Madame Phillippe de Montepsdon having died in Piedmont without issue, she was left a young, rich and beautiful widow, and was sought in marriage by several noble suitors. Among these was the Marquis de Staluces to whose attentions she seemed to listen favorably, and she permitted him to accompany her from Turin to Paris. It turned out, however, that the clever dame merely wished to have the advantage of his escort on the journey; and when she arrived at its termination she cavalierly dismissed him, saying:

"Adieu, sir; your lodging is at the hostel des Ursins, and mine at the hostel Saint Denis, close to that of the Augustius."

The marbuis still persisted in his suit, but as Phillippe continued obdurate, he asserted that she had made him a formal promise of marriage, and cited her to appear before the Court of Parliament. She came there attended by a numerous company of friends, and having been desired by the president to hold up her hand, she was asked whether she had ever promised marriage to the marquis, who was then present in court. She answered upon her honor that she had not; and when the court proceeded to press her with further questions, she exclaimed, with passionate warmth;

"Gentlemen, I never was in a court of justice before, and this makes me fear that I may not answer properly, but to put a stop to all captious cavailing and word-catching, I swear in the face of this assembly, of Heaven and the King—to the King, under the penalty of loss of honor and life—that I have never given pledge or promise of marriage to the Marquis de Saluces, and, what is more, that I never thought of such a thing in my life. And if there is anyone who will assert the contrary, here is my chevalier, whom I offer to maintain my words, which he kowns are entirely true, and uttered by the lips of a lady of honor, if ever there was one. This I do trusting in Heaven and my good right, and that he will prove the plaintiff to be (begging the pardon of the court) a villainous liar." This spirited defiance caused no little sensation in the audience, and the president told the registrar that he might put up his papers, for Madame Mareehale had taken another and much shorter road toward settling the dispute. Then, addressing the marquis, he asked;

"Well, sir, what say you to this challenge?"

But the love, as well as the valor of the latter, was fast oozing away; and the craven knight answered by a very decided negative:

"I want not," said he, "to take a wife by force; and if she does not wish to have me, I do not wish to have her."

And so, making a low obeisance to the court, he prudently retired, and the fair Phillippe heard no more of his pretentions to her hand.

BE pure but not stern; have moral excellences, but don't bristle with them.

IT is a very easy thing for a man to be wise for other people.

LOCAL ART NOTES.

GUETIEREZ has exhibited at Snow & Roos' another of his fine portraits, fully equal in point of execution, to his previous efforts. Such success in portraiture gives evidence of power to excel in other branches of art, and we hope to see some work from his hands establishing his claim to the designation of "Historical Painter" which his professional card gives him.

Marple's last production shown at the same place, represents a very brilliant beach scene, and is the most effective picture we have seen from his hand. The rock in the foreground is rather stiff and bare, and might be much improved without lessening the effect of the picture, but there is such boldness in the design and execution comparing it with his other paintings that in our gratification at his marked progress we are inclined to lose sight of its slight defects.

Young's view of Mt. Shasta, also shows considerable improvement in style, but he is hardly ripe for such subjects yet, and simple studies of the details of landscape which are here much neglected and badly arranged, would do him more credit.

Wandesforde has a lake scene at Jones and Wool's. We cannot omit a protest against the blueness of his skies and water. It cannot be natural, and it certainly is not pleasant to the eye. Even if such depth of color were true to nature, he should give the other portions of the landscape a correspodning tone, which he has not done, except, perhaps, in a few bright red patches upon the rocks in the foreground. His foliage is entirely wanting in freshness and brilliancy, causing a lack of harmony that is almost painful to the eye.

Keith has made a trip to the Summit, and returned with a portfolio of interesting sketches, which will shortly be given to the public in his excellent water-color drawings.

Many of our artists are absent from the city on sketching tours and will soon return with material for a winter's work. It seems to us that they have started out too late in the season to find the best colors in the landscapes, but we shall gladly welcome them back if they bring with them some other subjects for their skill than the much absurd Yosemite.

ASTRÆA.

EFFECTS OF IMAGINATION.—The mysterious influence exercised by the mind over the body is well illustrated in the following case contained in Dr. Warren's treatise on the preservation of health: "Some time since, a lady presented herself to me with a tumor, or swelling of the submaxillary gland of the neck. It was about the size of an egg, had lasted two years, and so very hard that I considered an effort to dissipate it by medicine to be in vain, and advised it to be removed by an operation. To this the patient could not bring her mind; therefore, to satisfy her wish, some applications of considerable activity were directed to be made to the part, and these she pursued a number of weeks without any change. After this, she called on me, and, with some hesitation, begged to know whether an application recommended to her would, in my opinion, be safe. This consisted in applying the hand of a dead man three times to the diseased part. One of her neighbors now lay dead, and she had an opportunity of trying the experiment, if not thought dangerous. At first, I was disposed to divert her from it, but, recollecting the power of imagination, gravely assured her that she might make the trial without apprehension of serious consequences. A while after, she presented herself once more, and, with a smiling face, informed me she had used this remedy, and on examining for the tumor it had disappeared."

THE OPERA.—The second season of the Italian Opera at the Academy of Music was not inaugerated. The lack of sufficient support being the cause. And yet San Francisco boasts of her liberality in operatic matters, when she is far behind some of the old sleepy cities of Germany. The people of Leipsic, for instance, have decided to build one of the most sumptuous theatres on the continent. Leipsic is not a great city, (only eighty-seven thousand inhabitants), but in the musical world it occupies high rank—for even the London Musical World is compelled to say that its performances surpass those of the metropolis itself.

THE proprietors of the new rolling-mill at Portsmouth, Ohio, are in possession of the true secret of Russian iron, directly from the only manufactory where it is made in Russia. The secret was sent to this country clandestinely, through the agency of a citizen of Youngstown, Ohio, and a relative he had in the iron works of Russia. It was sent, a word at a time, in along correspondence. Russia has heretofore kept a close monopoly on this superior iron, and has been able by it to extort from us as well as other nations a heavy revenue.

PACIFIC MUSEUM.—The wonderful models to be seen at this institution afford food for much useful reflection.

IT is bliss to learn lessons in love, for woman is our teacher.

To grow up to the skies, we must be planted low in the dust.

SUCCESS is not genuine merit, but it is a good counterfeit.

PARIS DURING THE EXPOSITION.

AT the present moment, when all eyes are directed toward the French capital, and the great industrial congregation of the whole world that is assembled there, anything that is calculated to furnish a graphic picture of the scene of this hitherto unprecedented display, is sure to prove welcome to the mass of intelligent readers. We have nowhere found more judicious and satisfactory descriptions of Paris during the Exposition, than those furnished by the correspondent of the New York Tribune. The following sketch, equally admirable for matter and manner, is condensed from his last letter: "Place yourself in the brightest city of the world on its brightest Monday morning. Winter, long and stormy, has rained its last. An April without showers lifts every gauze from the sun, so that he lights up the broad boulevards, and the fresh green river Seine, and shows every current setting for the Champ de Mars. When you climb to your house-top to follow the great caravans of men and wains and banners, you see around you the city of Paris, the home of two millions of people floating over the undulations of a pleasant plain, through the middle of which, lengthwise, curves a stream as clear as Croton Lake, no wider than the Passaic, and which, in its beautiful inutility, winds through 500 miles of France, without a tide or a sail. Of the two unequal parts into which it bisects Paris, the greater is the Northern, where you stand, set against an amphitheater of hills, populous to their summits, and bounded in the vast level tracts, near to the river, by two proud monuments, three miles apart. The one is the Arch of Triumph, to commemorate the glory of the original Bonaparte, the other is the shaft raised by the Republican people on the site of the Bastile, when they had driven the last licentious and bloody Bourbon from the capital.

Halfway between these monuments, and in line with them, in the geometrical center of the city, lies the mighty cluster of palaces, whose varying tenantry have made the history of modern Europe. Over the oldest of them to-day a tri-color flag is flying to show that the most recent lessee of the Tuileries is at home. It is in the central dome or pavilion of this huge building that Louis Napoleon may be found, and if we ascend thither we may see him, thus early, looking across the wood and flower garden before the palace, to a vast boiler-like structure, that, at a mile distant, coils in the midst of a flat, low-lying plain in the suburbs of Paris. The Seine, beneath him, reaches down to it, with frequent bridges, like a long bending ladder. It is upon the inferior side of the stream, and between it and the great Arch of Triumph, the opposite river bank is bold and high table-land, vacantly and suburbanly furnished. This huge boiler, as it seems, is the crowning show, the latest of his surprises, his bid to industry to appease uneasy history.

The perfectly level plain of the Champ de Mars, a year ago a hard parade, has been transformed into a wonderful fair ground, out of the midst of which arises an almost circular edifice of iron and glass, in shape like a vast boiler of concentric rings, pierced transversely by fifty avenues which radiate from a garden at the centre, where four huge fountains fling perpetual crystal. Under the awnings of this garden there are places for rest, and two of the broadest streets bisect it at right angles, while the two circular galleries immediately west of it are wholly filled with paintings and statuary. The outer rings are devoted to some grand department of manufactures, and the nations are so arranged, in segments proportionate to the quantity of their goods, that transverse streets divide them from each other. Thus, a visitor interested in silk, woolen, and cotton fabrics has but to keep one circular route continuously to pass in order the wares, in that specialty, of every existing nation. Without, the greatest circle of them all, next to the park, the restaurant of each nation lies, its food confined to the dishes, and its liquors to those beverages which are current at home; while the large park, encompassing the whole, is taken up with the characteristic buildings of particular lands, and experimental structures appertaining to the arts, sciences, and amusements. The borders of the Champ de Mars, on the extreme outer rectangle, are lined with large warehouses where great pieces of machinery are exposed; and the gates or turn-stiles giving admission to the whole, are placed at frequent intervals between these warehouses or annexes. The classification, both as to Palace and grounds, extends to the five continents, and, the Monroe Doctrine being scrupulously respected, we shall find the thirteen States arrayed with Mexico, Peru, and Patagonia, while Great Britian and France divide about half the world between them.

The Exhibition is meant to be a complete epitome of the world, performing within its grounds all the functions of all races—sleeping only excepted. The steam that drives the engines, the folly that relieves toil, the drinking, eating, and worshiping of every species of man must be manufactured and warehoused here. You see, out of the infinite number of towers and roofs that at first confuses you, a broad vestibule, wide as Broadway, 800 feet in length, opening straight from the bridge of Jena to the Palace. This is canopied with green vellum, spangled with golden bees, the emblem of the Bonapartes, and every foot of it surmounted with the flag of an independent nation. Flowers and statues line it on either side; the Imperial tri-colors, banderolles, and oriflammes are flung from two great gonfalon masts at the portal; on the roof of the Palace, climbing through the sky as if the tinted clouds had descended to wreathe it, all the colors of each nation wave; and in the angle between the long vestibule and the deep curve of the Palace, the broad, white ermine, bright with bees, stretched upon the sceptre and cross, denotes the pavilion of the Emperor. The buildings in the Park are capped with fanciful flags, indicative of their purposes; yonder you see the crescent of the Turk dominating his mosque, and the crocheted pagodas tell of Thibet and the land of tea; the frowning, sepulchral portals of the Egyption adjoin the more intellectual effigies of the Assyrian lion, where lie sucking their pipes the pure-skinned Persians; high over all a lighthouse pierces the sky, and the twinkle of waters among the trees denotes the ripple of artificial lakes that discharge under an iron bridge into the animated Seine. A railway depot, whose rails go flying through the air and sapping a block of houses alternately to pass the river and thread the city, is equaled in spaciousness, nearest the eye, by a great international club-house for the bourse of the world. Past and beyond all, the far-sweeping valley of the river goes; to the right among the purple and palaced hills, and dark forests; to the left, under its marble bridges, a score in number, pointing at its various angles, now to the far dome of the Pantheon, now to the towers of Notre Dame, now to the steep of Montmatre and the tombstones in the groves of Pere la Chaise.

Twice the dimensions of the great circle of the Exhibition, which has been not inaptly compared to a monstrous gasometer, is the park environing it, 1,000 yards in length and in breadth 300. Sixty edifices are interspersed in this; 2,000 trees of good umbrageous growth are planted in it; five lakes and three waterfalls lie in its cool grasses; it is intersected, with artistic irregularity, by 70 paths and drives, and it contains one edifice of every architecture known to civilized man. If you enter from the great portal on the side of the Seine, and turn off the broad vestible to either side, you meet successively a Spanish theater, where the Gitanos dance to the clinkling pulses of castinets; a Chinese booth, where jougleurs impale each other and eat red-hot fire; a Protestant chapel, where there is worship every day and in the English language; a hospital, where any wounded in the crush of multitudes or by machinery receive speedy relief; an Egyptian cemetery in gorgeous Moresque; a French ball where the girls in the cancan throw their feet into the spheres, waltzing eccentrically to the music of "Fra Diavolo;" an international theater, where, at alternate hours, a troop of every known nation, from Fetish dancers to negro minstrels make hilarity; a lake of clear water filled with the trout of Fontainbleau that Bonaparte used to feed, a tropical aquarium where you can see a weak copy of Hugo's Devil Fish, catching spiders and minnows as a lady's fan catches hearts; a Gothic cathedral, brown as if with age, and pompous with masses from noon till dark; chalets of the Swiss, such as grow on Alpine tops, with real chamois grazing on their miniature precipices; Swedish and Russian shops and huts, grotesquely carved, where candles are sold as articles of food, and the reindeer's horns branch from the gables; a mock harem, inhabited by real Georgian girls, not prepossessing enough to keep close in their country; many Chinese pagodas, all of porcelain, where Confucius looks contempt at the outside barbarians; Japanese households, with two of their countrywomen, and a pair of little-footed wives or grass widows from China, smiling like a couple of almonds with double kernels in them; strange houses for rare lamps and engines; cooking-furnaces that make such dishes as would turn a Christian stomach though it had forty coats; innumerable pavilions of rustic patterns, sealed by kissing flowers with thirsty cups; kiosques and orchestral stations, which blow music and the tinkle of bells on every quivering sunbeam; tents such as are spread by the Arabs when they open the Thousand and One Nights and call the Genii into their opium smoke; observatories where the telescopes swing all day; and tiny rivers trickling off through pearly bottoms, turning little mills; while in the air great wind-wings turn lazily, as in a Dutchman's dream, and over all the light-house, 130 feet in the clouds, flings its solid calcium glare into the constellations, to rival their fixed blaze. The garden is a green convalescence after the cramped splendor of the Exhibition, when the tints of a Continental day mock the painted glasses of the Babel interior; here stroll the little girls, half-way over womanhood, the soft lights fading from their faces and the ruddiness of thoughtful and dawning ambitions making deeper tints, while the great English dames stagger down the walks in the beefness of their middle age, and florid ladies of Germany, all of one fervid flax, rise up in the perspective like some metamorpharized fields of overripe grain. Among these you see the American girl, delicate-eyed, speaking heart, and thought and purity in every modest step, light of foot and shy of presence, the noblest and less imitable contribution the world has given. At night, when the hammers are quiet within the broad palace, and in the grasses the tapers glisten as if they were burning drops of dew, the gaieties of the garden start into life, and in the cafés chantant the globes of light fall upon beautiful singers, twirling the tambourine."

HOW TO DRESS WELL.

IN an old number of All the Year Round, we find the following: "As you look from your window in Paris, observe the first fifty women who pass; forty have noses depressed in the middle, a small quantity of dark hair, and a swarthy complexion; but then, what a toilet! Not only suitable for the season, but to the age and complexion of the wearer. How neat the feet and hands! How well the clothes are put on, and, more than all, how well they suit each other!"

We have often said the same thing in other words. Before our English women can dress perfectly, they must have the taste of the French, especially in color. One reason why we see colors ill-arranged in this country is, that the different articles are purchased each for its own imagined virtues, and without any thought of what it is to be worn with. Women, while shopping, buy what pleases the eye on the counter, forgetting what they have got at home. That parasol is pretty, but it will kill by its color one dress in the buyer's wardrobe, and be unsuitable for all others. To be magnificently dressed certainly costs money; but, to be dressed with taste, is not expensive. It requires good sense, knowledge, refinement. Never buy an article, unless it is suitable to your age, habits, style and to the rest of your wardrobe. Nothing is more vulgar than to wear costly laces with a common delaine, or cheap laces with expensive brocades.

What colors, we may be asked, go best together? Green with violet: gold with dark crimson or lilac; pale blue with scarlet; pink with black or white; and grey with scarlet or pink. A cold color generally requires a warm tint to give life to it. Grey and pale blue, for instance, do not combine well, both being cold colors. White and black are safe wear, but the latter is not favorable to dark or pale complexions. Pink is, to some skins, the most becoming; not, however, if there is much color in the cheeks or lips; and if there be even a suspicion of red either hair or complexion. Peach-color is perhaps one of the most elegant colors worn. Maize is very becoming, particularly to persons with dark hair and eyes. But whatever the color or material of the entire dress, the details are all in all; the lace round the bosom and sleeves, the flowers; in fact, all that furnishes the dress. If trimmed with black lace, some of the same should be worn in the head, and the flowers that are worn in the hair should decorate the dress.

MUSIC OF SOLOMON'S TEMPLE.—The disentombing of Assyrian sculptures and the deciphering of Assyrian and Egyptian inscriptions, have opened new fields of investigation in almost every department of masonic knowledge. Among the branches of science which have shared in these discoveries, that of music has been benefited largely. The accounts of ancient musical instruments were vague, and our ideas, especially of Hebrew music, were confused, till recently sculptures and paintings have been brought to light which delineate the musical instruments of early Oriental nations, and in a number of cases veritable specimens have been disentombed. Such, in example, is an Egyptian harp found in Thebes, with its strings yet perfect enough to vibrate again, after a silence of three thousand years.

The more recent investigations prove that the parents of all known musical science is Assyria. From the Assyrians, the Hebrews, and the Egyptians, and, indeed, all Eastern nations, derived their knowledge of music. The unveiled monuments show that in the time of Sennacherib, music was a highly cultured art, and must have existed through generations. This polished nation used a harp of twenty strings, the frame, of which was four feet high, which accompanied minstrel songs, or was borne in the dance. The lyre of tortoise shell the double pipe, the trumpet, drum and bell we common. Even of the bagpipe, representations have been described, though none of stringed instruments like the violin played with the bow.

In all delineations of social or worshipping assemblies, musical instruments very like our modern ones have a prominent place. The Hebrew music, in the time of the Exodus, was purely Egyptian; but it was much modified subsequently in associations with Asiatic nations. In the Temple of Jerusalem, according to the Talmud, stood a powerful organ, consisting of a wind chest with ten holes, containing ten pipes each pipe capable of emitting ten different sounds by means of finger holes, so that a hundred sounds could be produced by it. It was provided with two pair of bellows and ten keys, so that it could be played with the fingers. According to the Rabbins, it could be heard a great distance from the Temple, and some masonic historian state in the most confident manner that our Grand Master, Solomon, performed the duties of his office to the music of that organ.

INSECT. LIFE—Insects, generally, must lead a truly jovial life. Think what it must be to lodge in a lily—imagine a palace of ivory or pearl, with pillars of silver, and capitals of gold, all exhaling such a perfume as never arose from gum or censer. Fancy, again, the fun of tucking yourself up for a night in the folds of a rose, rocked to sleep by the gentle sighs of the summer air, and nothing to do when you awake but to wash yourself in a clear dew-drop, and fall to and eat your bedclothes.

MILLINERY AND HEAD-DRESSES.—Mrs. Winship has just received, per last steamer, the latest Parisian Millinery Goods and Laces for HEAD-DRESS, consisting in part of Breakfast Caps, Point Application, Lace Vallenciumes, and the Widow's Rooche, worn by the crown heads of Europe, and the only first imported to the Pacific Coast. Queen Emma, while here, replenished her wardrobe from the stock then and now on hand, at MRS. WINSHIP, No. 23 Post Street, under the Mechanics' Institute. Through the influence of Queen Emma, Mrs. Winship has filled quite a number of orders for the foreign population of Honolulu. The ladies of San Francisco should call and examine these beautiful Goods, by which means they will secure the Latest Fashionable Styles.

WHAT'S THE MATTER?—In passing through Third street yesterday, we saw crowds of people entering a building a few doors below Market street, and we inquired of a passer-by what's the matter? He answered that they were going to have their pictures taken in the NEW YORK PHOTOGRAPHIC GALLERY, and the cause of the rush was that this took the best and cheapest pictures in the city; the inducement must be much to draw so big a crowd from Montgomery and the other streets in the northern part of the city.

MAYER'S BAZAAR.—R. Mayer offers at his Bazaar, corner Pine and Montgomery streets, the greatest variety of jewelry, watches, silver plated ware, guitars, music boxes; concertinas, accordeons, opera glasses, etc., etc., to the public of San Francisco, and to the country trade, at prices that defy competition, and is determined to close out his present stock at greatly reduced rates. His heavy case silver watches from the American Watch Company are superior to anything ever before offered to the public. These watches are taking the place of heavy gold watches from the fact that the workmanship is superior, the casings pure silver, and the prices low. The sale of these watches is very extensive on the Pacific coast. Another proof that American manufactures can beat the world. The works are made of platina and never get out of repair. French opera glasses of great power for sale or hire, and all kinds of musical instruments, eight day family clocks, etc. This is a rare chance to invest your money to advantage, at Mayer's Bazaar, southeast corner of Montgomery and Pine streets.

N. B.—An immense assortment of Japanese curiosities for sale.

WAGONS.

MILLS & EVANS, IMPORTERS OF THOROUGH-BRACE Wagons, light express, two and three spring Wagons, suitable for milk-men and furniture dealers, and others wishing light and durable Wagons. Their Wagons are made expressly for the California market, and Mills & Evans' is the only firm which receives Wagons from the celebrated manufactory of A. W. Sanborn & Co., Manchester, N. H. This latter firm stands A No. 1 in the East, and their wagons have stood the test of our California climate, and are sold by Mills & Evans fifty per cent. lower than any other establishment on the Pacific coast. Call and examine their Wagons, at No. 587 Market street, opposite the Metropolitan market. *

MEDICAL.—"YOUNG MAN'S FRIEND AND PROTECTOR," an association for beneficent objects, Young men should inform themselves in relation to it, and by applying to, the ACTUARY, Dr. Bourne, 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, they will be furnished with Prospectus.

☞ WONDERFUL BUT TRUE.—MADAME REMINGton, the world-renowned Astrologist and Somnambulistic Clairvoyant, while in a clairvoyant state, delineates the very features of the person you are to marry, and by the aid of an instrument of intense power, known as the Psychomotrope, guarantees to produce a perfect and life like picture of the future husband or wife of the applicant, with date of marriage, occupation, leading traits of character, etc. This is no imposition, as testimonials without number can assert. By stating place of birth, age, disposition, color of eyes and hair, and enclosing fifty cents and stamped envelope addressed to yourself, you will receive the picture by return mail, together with desired information.
Address in confidence, MADAME GERTRUDE REMINGTON, P. O. Box 297, West Troy, N. Y.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, heals, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the solution which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, should do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, he can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; and does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his cure. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

ANOTHER DOCTOR IN THE CITY.

DR. H. A. BENTON has been performing many wonderful cures in this city the past two years, and as his practice is fast increasing at the office, finds it difficult to attend outside calls, concluded to invite R. H. OLMSTEAD, M. D., of Napa City, to join him. Dr. Olmstead has been 18 years successfully treating obstinate cases, with water, electricity, and the magnetic forces, (and when needed, Eclectic Remedies, of which he is a graduate of that school); also, being the seventh son of a celebrated Physician, and having a powerful organization, his magnetic hands, like magic, dispel pain and disease in a wonderful manner; he is also a natural BONE SETTER.

DR. OLMSTEAD has this day associated with Dr. H. A. BENTON, the Medical Electrician and Homœpathist, at his office, 314 Bush street, San Francisco, who, having all the necessary facilities, such as the Patent Electro-Chemical, Sulphur, Vapor, Hot Air, and Medicated Baths, which are valuable aids in removing all curable diseases, whether acute or chronic. The combined skill, together with the aid of an excellent Lady Assistant, gives an assurance of CURE TO MANY, BENEFIT TO ALL, AND INJURY TO NONE.

"IF I WERE A PAINTER."

I could paint the mill-stream, cut in two
By the beat o' the summer skies,
And the sand-bar, with its long brown black,
And round and bubbly eyes,
And the bridge, that hung so high o'er the tide,
Creaking and swinging from side to side.

The miller's pretty little wife,
In the cottage that she loves,—
Her hand so white, and her step so light,
And her eyes as brown as th' doves',
Her tiny waist, and belt of blue,
And her hair that almost dazzles you.

I could paint the White Hawk tavern, flanked
With broken and wind-warped sheds,
And the rock where the black clouds used to sit,
And trim their watery heads
With little springles of shining light,
Night and morning, morning and night.

The road, where, slow and wearily,
The dusty teamster came,—
The sign on its post and round-faced host,
And the high arched door aflame
With trumpet-flowers,—the well-weep, high,
And the flowing water-trough, close by.

ALICE CARY.

A man was chopping wood before his door with his children playing about him. A stranger came along and bid him good morning. The man replied somewhat gruffly. "Fine children you have, sir." "Yes." "All grown?" "Of course." "This is a nice little girl." "That's Elizer." "That's a what sir?" "That's Elizer." The stranger couldn't stand that, and immediately piched into pater familias, while the children ran screaming into the house. The noise brought out the old woman, who succeeded in explaining matters after the belligerents had become pretty well tuckered out.

A singular duel has just taken place at Berlin between a journeyman silversmith and another artisan. The arms selected were a bottle of sulphuric acid. The arrangements was that whichever of the adversaries threw the lowest with dice, should swallow the contents of the fatal phial. Chance favored the silversmith, who immediately poured out a glass of the liquor and handed it to his adversary, who unhesitatingly drank of the liquid, but, to the astonishment of this antagonist, instead of falling senseless, smacked his lips and asked for another glass. The seconds had acted on the sensible idea of substituting arrack for the corrosive fluid. It is hardly necessary to say that the affair terminated in a reconciliation.

Thomas Paine was probably the first man who suggested the practicability of constructing bridges of iron, and he conceived the idea from contemplating the fabrication of a spider's web when he was in the United States. In 1787 Paine presented to the Academy of Sciences, at Paris, the model of a bridge which he had invented, and when he resided at Rotherdam, in Yorkshire, a bridge, chiefly of wrought iron, was constructed under his direction by the Messrs. Walker.

MARGUERITE.

Pale golden hair,
Waving as the billowy sea,
Wreathing, like the ivy free,
Her brow so fair.

Deep, thoughtful eyes,
Seeming, through their lashes bright,
Jewels set in golden light,
Dropped from the skies.

A voice so clear—
Like the tinkling of vesper bells
Coming soft through mossy dells,
Gladdening the ear.

A smile most sweet—
Beaming like the sun's bright ray
Stealing through some cloister gray,
Has Marguerite.

THE RECENT EARTHQUAKE IN SMYRNA AND MYTILENE.—A letter from Mytileue, the ancient island of Lesbos says:—"On Wednesday, the 6th, the weather was dull and the heat disagreeable, as it is nearly always when the wind blows from the south, but no presentiments were felt of the sad events which were to follow. Although the heat was of a sufficiently pronounced volcanic character, it was attributed to the return of the spring. In the memory of man no earthquake had been felt on the island. At 6 o'clock on the morning of the 8th, a severe shock, lasting between fifteen and eighteen moments, rocked the town, and after a short interval, another followed, much longer and more violent. At this moment I arrived at the office of the Austrian Lloyd's, and a minute or two after the shock, I saw the sea inside the harbor heave and foam as if a submarine explosion was about to take place. My astonishment did not however, last very long, for in less time than it takes me to tell the fact, I saw all the surrounding buildings moving as if they were drunken men, and the solid blocks of masonry, of which the piers are constructed, tumbling like card-houses The office of the Austrian Lloyd's, and nearly all the buildings which belong to the Custom House, the lighthouse, and the large oil-mill also giving way. In all the streets houses fell, burying their inhabitants beneath their ruins. The ancient and beautiful castle, the cathedral, the goveuor's palace, the prisous, the mosques, and, I believe, all the consular residences, are more or less injured, and for the most part are no better than a mass of ruius. The very solidiiy and strength with which the houses iu the town were constructed rendered more serious the effects of this great calamity, and have multiplied a hundred-fold the number of persons who had perished or have lost their property. That part of the town which was lowest has suffered most. The earth literally opened and engulfed a number of buildings forming a street which led from the seashore to the iuterior of the town; and that which was still on Wednesday afternoon the most frequented part of Mytilene is now actually invaded by the sea, and covered by heaps of mud. In one word, more than one-half of our beautiful town; the most delightful and gayest in the whole Levant is nothing more than a desert heaped with ruins. What is still sadder to record is the number of deaths. It is calculated that from 800 to 1,000 persons have been killed, and a still more considerable number wounded and disabled Up to this day 120 bodies have been recovered from ruins to which access is safe; but how many others are buried in the mass of debris which it would be dangerous to attempt to remove! The houses which are still standing are nearly all deserted, and the surviving population scattered through the hills and gardens in the vicinity of the town. The town of Mytilene is not the only sufferer by this calamity, it has made ruins and victims in the northern part of the island. It is douthful whether a single village has been saved. Not only has property suffered, but almost everywhere there are numbers of dead and dying."

A Remarkable Character in Paris.—The Patrie thus speaks of a young woman who is exciting curiosity in Paris:

"She is from five to six and twenty. Her complexion is of a warm golden tint, the Florentine bronze. She is never clad but in a black dress, made high, and ending at the neck in a row of large coral beads of a blood red, and at her wrists with bracelets of the same material and hue. From beneath her cap, a sort of beret or Scotch bonnet—black also, and encircled with a row of coral beads—flow long and thick tresses, so black that they are blue. She is never seen on foot. Her 'Victoria, is drawn by a hair of ponies black as ebony, at a pace which makes the pavement smoke again. The black and red of her costume and equipage, added to her bronzed complexion, invest her with a sinister and somewhat diabolical air. She is known only by the designation of 'La Dame au Corail.' Those who have been curious enough to investigate something of her history and habits of life, report that she is immensely rich, travles with six servants—two Indian woman and four men, one of whom is a negro, the others being of the same bronzed complexion as their mistress, that she spends much of her time playing on a species of guzla, or else practising with a saloon pistol at a target, which target repsents a female figure of blonde complexion, about the size of the largest dolls; lastly, she is from Java, and lives exclusively on fruits and preserves. She is said to have blown out the brains of one of her slaves who entered her apartments unsummoned. But the most remarkale circumstance about her is that day and night the shutters are closed, and her apartment illuminated with candelabras. At night she sings plaintive melodies more like wailings than set tunes, and she smokes opium and sleeps on panther skins. She is said to be the widow of a great personage in the island of Sumatra, who had committed suicide after an outburst of jealousy on her part, caused by his suspected attachment to the wife of an English naval officer."

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

TO

Purify the Blood.

NOT A FEW OF THE WORST DISORDERS THAT afflict mankind arise from the corruption that accumulates in the blood. Of all the discoveries that have been made to purge it out, none have been found which could equal in effect AYER'S COMPOUND EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. It cleanses and renovates the blood, instills the vigor of health into the system and purges out the humors which make disease. It stimulates the healthy functions of the body, and expels the disorders that grow and rankle in the blood. Its extraordinary virtues are not yet widely known, but, when they are, it will no longer be a question what remedy to employ in the great variety of afflicting diseases that require an alterative remedy. Such a remedy, that could be relied on, has long been sought for, and now, for the first time, the public have one on which they can depend. Our space here does not admit certificates to show its effects. But the trial of a single bottle will show to the sick that it has virtues surpassing anything they have ever taken. Sufferers from Scrofula, Scrofulous Swellings and Sores, try it and see the rapidity with which it cures. Skin Diseases, Pimples, Pustules, Blotches, Eruptions, etc., are soon cleaned out of the system.

St. Anthony's Fire, Rose or Erysipelas, Tetter or Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Ringworm, etc., should not be borne while they can be so speedily cured by AYER'S SARSAPARILLA.

Syphilis or Venereal Disease is expelled from the system by the prolonged use of this SARSAPARILLA, and the patient is left as healthy as if he never had the disease.

Female Diseases are caused by Scrofula in the blood, and are generally soon cured by this EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. Price $1 per bottle, or 6 bottles for $5.

For all the purposes of a family physic, take AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS, which are everywhere known to be the best purgative that is offered to the American People.

Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by all Druggists and dealers in medicine everywhere.

WHITE LIQUID ENAMEL,

FOR IMPROVING AND BEAUTIFYING THE COMplexion.

The most valuable and perfect preparation in use, for giving the skin a beautiful pearl-like tint, that is only found in youth. It quickly removes Tan, Freckles, Pimples, Blotches, Moth Patches, Sallowness, Eruptions, and all impurities of the skin, kindly healing the same, leaving the skin white and clear as alabaster. Its use cannot be detected by the closest scrutiny, and being a vegetable preparation is perfectly harmless. It is the only article of the kind used by the French, and is considered by the Parisian as indispensable to a perfect toilet. Upwards of 30,000 bottles were sold during the past year, a sufficient guarantee of its efficacy. Price only 75 cents. Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of order, by

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

EDWARD J. QUIRK, Plaintiff, vs. JAMES P. HORBACH, et als., Defendants

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the said city and county of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES P. HORBACH, HENRY DELVENDAHL, HENRY BREMMERMAN, ERNST JANSSEN and GUSTAV HELMKE, Defendants:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this District, within twenty days, otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to require you, the said defendants, to set forth the nature of your respective claims to that certain lot or parcel of land situate in said city and county of San Francisco, as particularly described in the complaint herein, being subdivision No. 5 of the 100 vara lot known on the map of the city of San Francisco as No. 276, as designated on a plat of the original subdivision thereof, recorded in the office of the County Recorder of said city and County, in Liber 1 of Certified Grants, at page 156, that all adverse claims of said defendants and each of them may be determined by a decree of this Court; that by said decree it be declared and adjudged that the said defendants, each and all of them, have no estate or interest whatever in or to said parcel of land, and that the title of plaintiff thereto is good and valid; that said defendants, and each of them, be forever debarred from asserting any claim whatever in and to said land adverse to plaintiff, and for such other and further relief as to this Hon. Court shall seem meet and agreeable to equity, with costs of suit against such of the defendants as shall defend this action.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, this 25th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven.

TO THE UNFORTUNATE

NEW REMEDIES! NEW REMEDIES!

Dr. Gibbon's Dispensary.

ESTABLISAED IN 1854,
616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco.

For the treatment of Sexual and Seminal Diseases, such as gonorrhœa, gleet, stricture, syphilis in all its forms, seminal weakness, impotency, &c. Skin Diseases, (of years' standing,) and Ulcerated legs, successfully treated.

HORRIBLE DISEASES.

How many thousands of persons both male and female are there who are suffering out a miserable existence from the effects of secret indulgence, or from virus absorbed into the system. Look at their pallid, emaciated and disfigured faces, and their broken constitutions, disqualifying them for the happiness of marriage or the enjoyment of life. In this horrid situation thousands suffer until death closes the scene. Let parents, guardians and friends, attend to those who are suffering with any of these horrible, life-destroying maladies—see that they are cared for and cured before it be too late. Send them to Dr. Gibbon, a physician who has made private diseases his especial study for years, and who is certain to cure the most inveterate cases without mercury or any injurious drugs. It is important to those who are afflicted, to he careful of the many pretended Doctors who infest all cities, publishing their skill in curing all diseases in a few days, imposing upon the public hy using the names of eminent physicians from Europe and other places. Be therefore careful and make strict inquiry, or you may fall into the hands of these charlatans.

Syphilis is syphilis the world over; so is small pox, consumption, and other diseases, to the contrary of what quacks may say.

SEMINAL WEAKNESS.

Seminal weakness the consequent of self abuse. This solitary vice, or depraved sexual indulgence, is practiced hy the youth of both sexes to an almost unlimited extent, producing with unerring certainty the following train of morbid symptoms, unless combatted by scientific medical measure; sallow countenances, dark spots under the eyes, pain in the head, ringing in the ears, noise like the rustling of leaves and rattling of chariots, uneasines about the loins, weakness of the limbs, confused vision, blunt intellect, loss of confidence, diffidence in approaching strangers, a dislike to form new acquaintances, a disposition to shun society, loss of memory, hectic flushes, pimples and various eruptions about the face, furred tongue, fetid breath, coughs, consumption, night sweats, monomania, and frequent insanity. If relief be not obtained, should apply immediately, either in person or by letter, and have a cure effected by his new and scientific mode of treating this complaint, which never fails of effecting a quick and radical cure. Dr. G. will give $100 to any person who will prove satisfactorily to him that he was cured by either of the San Francisco quacks.

Dr. Gibbon is responsible, and will give each patient a written instrument binding himself to effect a radical and permanent cure or make no charge.

Persons at a distance may be cured at home by addressing a letter to Dr. Gibbon, stating case, symptoms, length of time the disease has continued, and have medicine promptly forwarded, free from damage and curiosity, to any part of the country, with full and plain directions for use, for ten dollars, sent in a registered letter, or through Wells, Fargo & Co.

Address DR. J. F. GIBBON, 616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco, Postoffice Box 252.

CAUTION TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

Beware of the San Francisco quacks and pretenders who with bogus sworn-to certificates, dupe the unwary. Some of the self styled doctors whose names are to be found in all the daily and weekly papers of San Francisco and other places, are tradesmen, and become too lazy to work at their trade. Some are tinsmiths, shoemakers, newspaper carriers, intelligence offices keepers, etc. Look over the San Francisco City Directory and you will find their former occupation in it. Look at the Directory for 1862-63. The only way to avoid imposition is make inquiry—it will cost you nothing and may save you many regrets, for advertising physicians in eight cases out of ten are bogus, there is no safety in trusting any of them till you know who and what they are. Dr. Gibbon does not deceive people by exhibiting bogus titles, certificates, pretended patients' letters, etc. Dr. Gibbon Will satisfy persons who may call at his office of his ability to treat diseases that he proposes to cure.

☞ Persons writing to Dr. Gibbon will Please state the name of the paper they see his advertisement in.

IF there is a Florence Sewing Machine within a thousand miles of San Francisco, that is not giving entire satisfaction, if I am informed of it, it will be attended to without express charge or expense of any kind to the owner. Samuel Hill, Agent, 111 Montgomery St., San Francisco.

The Very Latest News from New York.

For an enterprising go-ahead paper, one that keeps up with the times, give us the Alta. There is no Rip Van Winklo on thut paper. Look at that letter from "Arion," at New York, published in Wednesday's issue. The date of the letter is, April 25th, 1866—no 1867. Let us not wrong the Alta. "Arion" tells us that: "A fashion has lately come in vogue here, imported from Paris with other fanciful ideas of a similarly elevating nature, called the "tilting hoop," or crinoline, which, as the wearer walks through the streets, has the faculty of bouncing up and down upon wire springs, so as to display the ankle and feet, if not the lower limbs, to advantage."

Dew toll! We want to know. Wonder what sort of things those tilting hoops are, anyhow. May be in the course of a month or two we shall shall see one of them in San Francisco.

The next bit of news "Arion" gives us is, that Bateman refused to pay Augustus Daly for translating Leah. That's too bad. We are glad to learn that a jury gave a verdict in Mr. Daly's favor, for the $150 he claimed.

It appears from "Arion's" lotter, and he seems well posted, that the nitro-glycerine case which "recently produced such a sensation in San Francisco," is before the New York Courts. "Arion" concludes his letter with some interesting news concerning Miss Adah Isaacs Menken. He says she, "with all her beautiful horses, her chamber-maid, and valets de chambre, takes an airing this afternoon in the Central Park.

The Menken is to commence her engagement at the Broadway Theatre, in "Mazeppa," on Monday next, hence the airing of the Park to day. She is training, you know, and all that sort of thing is very necessary."

Now if the Alta can get as late news as the above, from New York, why can't the other papers do it? That's what we want to know? We don't care for the garbled accounts of Eastern events which come by telegraph, if the Alta can continue to furnish us with cleverly written, and interesting details so soon after the occurrences have taken place. Our only fear is that the Alta won't be able to keep up its lick. However, we have done our best in the way of giving it credit for its enterprise. It will be observed that not one of the other dailies in this city has this week made mention of the events recorded in "Arion's" letter.

Brother Earle and Bricks.

Bro. Earle, judging from recent events, is realizing in a very pleasant manner the truth of the passage "Cast thy bread upon the waters and thou shalt find it in many days"—in many bricks. In Virginia city Bro. Earle got a brick. In Grass Valley he got a brick. Poor local preachers don't get many bricks. Figuratively speaking they receive more kicks than bricks.

Bro. Earle is right. The apostles were commanded to take neither purse nor scrip, but there was no limitation regarding the bricks.

It is the Early bird that gathers the bricks.

The Object of Sidewalks.

Our merchants store their wares on the sidewalks, thereby interfering with the locomotion of those obliged to go on foot. A trip the length of three blocks in the business portion of the city, involves about nine turn-outs, two stumbles, three personal collisions and one or two narrow escapes from being run over. It is pleasant for the opulent merchant to sit comfortably in his door way and see the distress and inconvenience caused by his bales and barrels. It is refreshing to the soul of the Commercial street clothing dealer to see his shop-worn garments flapping in the afternoon breeze, and bewildering the passers-by entangled in empty pantaloon legs and tender coat tails. Have we a burnt-out mammoth stove which we cannot sell, store or give away? Put it on the sidewalk. Are you ripping up your store, or bar-fixtures, counters, shelves, etc? Put them on the sidewalk. There are people foolish enough to imagine that sidewalks were instituted for convenience of passage. All a mistake. They are for storage. Walk in the street. Respect the sanctity of private property.

Japanese Babies Wanted.

Hundreds of married ladies in this city whom Providence has not seen fit to bless with offspring, are gnashing their teeth with rage and envy at the good fortune of a gentleman connected with the Press of this city who has secured a Japanese baby. This happy man was, on Monday, appointed guardian of the little daughter of one of the female performers of the Great Dragon Troupe. We are told that "The little girl is about five years of age, quite as white as the majority of children of pure Caucasian parentage, and very intelligent for her age. The mother appeared in the Probate Court, in full Japanese costume, creating quite a sensation. She appears to be deeply attached to the child but freely gave her consent to the adoption of the little one, desiring to have it brought up in American style and the Christian faith.

Since this fact became generally known the rage for Japanese babies has became immense. Mrs. Snuffton, the much beloved wife of Jeremiah Snuffton, the well-known Front-street merchant, has been told never to speak to her again until he has procured her a Japanese baby. The following dialogue occurred on Mrs. Snuffton's making her demand.

SNUFFTON.—My dear Laura!

MRS. SNUFFTON.—Don't "dear" me, sir. I want a Japanese baby and I'll have one.

SNUFFTON.—But, my love, there was only one to be disposed of—

MRS. SNUFFTON.—Yes. And you've allowed a newspaper man, a fellow who lives by his brains, who hasn't a thousand dollars in the world most likely, you've allowed him to get it. You, Jeremiah Snuffton, the cheese and butter merchant, whose note is good for three hundred thousand dollars! What's the use of your money, I should like to know, if you can't get me what I want with it?

SNUFFTON—My dear, I will get you a baby—

MRS. SNUFFTON.—A Japanese baby?

SNUFFTON.—Well—no—my dear—won't another do as well?

MRS. SNUFFTON.—Mr. Snuffton I don't want any baby but a Japanese baby. Good gracious! Other babies are plentiful enough. It is only the rarity of a thing that makes it valuable. Oh! that ever you should have been fool enough to let a common newspaper man get that dear, darling, sweet, little Japanese baby, when you knew it was just the thing that would please me.

SNUFFTON.—(Makes a suggestion.) Wouldn't a little—Chi-na ba—

MRS. SNUFFTON.—Snuffton, you're a brute. A China baby! They're common as mosquitoes; anyone could get a China baby. No, I'll tell you what you must do. You must go to that newspaper man and tell him you are Jeremiah Snuffton, of Front street, and want that baby for Mrs. Snuffton.

SNUFFTON.—My dear, he wouldn't give it to me on that account.

MRS. SNUFFTON.—Wouldn't he? Doesn't he know you are worth nearly half a million, and are better able to take care of the child than he is? Wouldn't he give it up?

SNUFFTON.—I'm afraid not, my love.

MRS. SNUFFTON. Then pay him for it. Give him five hundred, six hundred, eight hundred dollars for it. There!

SNUFFTON.—You don't understand. This child has been adopted by a gentleman, and should I make such an offer to him he would probably kick me

MRS. SNUFFTON.—(aghast,) Snuffton! kick you. A newspaper man on a salary of some two or the hundred dollars a month—I don't suppose he gets more—kick you, a Front-street merchant! Not much.

SNUFFTON.—(mournfully.) I'm afraid he would, my dear. At any rate, I do not feel myself justified in running the risk.

MRS. SNUFFTON.—(crying.) Oh, what a poor, wretched, miserable, forsaken woman I am. What a husband I've got! The only thing I ever asked you for, and I'm refused. Oh! Snuffton, it was for this you took me from my home was it? You brute.

[Here it may be as well to state, that Mrs. Snuffton's home was not a hall of dazzling light, but a very humble, three-roomed cottage, near a wood-yard on Kearny street.]

SNUFFTON.—Don't cry, my dear. I would if I could. I'll try. (a thought strikes him.) Yes, I'll see what can be done.

MRS. SNUFFTON.—Oh! you darling! Will you get that Japanese baby?

SNUFFTON.—No; not that one but another one; as the razor-strop man says, "there's just one more left." Good bye. I must go at once.

[Exit, with the intention of procuring a half-breed Chinese child, whom he is sure he can pass off on Mrs. Snuffton as the real article.]

MRS. SNUFFTON.—A newspaper man, indeed!

[Exit to her dressing room to put on her velvet dress and sable cape ("cost $1,000. not a cent less") before walking out under the broiling rays of the sun on Montgomery street.]

The following dialogue, or one very similar to it, took place in the house of many a wealthy citizen of San Francisco. We are sorry to say that Snuffton's attempt at fraud was discovered yesterday, at 3 P. M. Snuffton was summoned from his office, and was told that "he'd better take that ere bogus brut out of the house right away, for if he didn't she'd drown it." We are happy to state that the present demand will shortly be supplied as two spirited individuals intend to start immediately for Yokohama, for the purpose of bringing back a ship-load of Japanese babies.

An Apology to Professor Gilliard.

We owe the colored Professor an apology and hasten to make it. We have on several occasions accused him of writing letters from Sacramento to the Bulletin over the signature of "Moffat Weir." We have received the following letter from the Bulletin's correspondent. He denies being Gilliard, and we are bound to believe that he is not. We beg the Professor will accept our apology. We fear we may be doing wrong in, from a perhaps mistaken idea of kindness, complying with Moffat Weir's request and publishing his letter. If it causes an increase of his mental affliction, we shall never cease to reproach ourselves.

Sacramento, June 19th, 1867.

To the Editors of the Californian:

DEAR SIR: As your really excellent paper is circulated widely and read diligently here as elsewhere, it is to my own disrepute that I have not until to-day read your remarks in your issue of the 23rd of March upon my remarks upon MRS. CUPPY. Do you know that I consider you a singularly absurd old duffer! Well, I do, upon my word. You rate me for retailing the sinister young man's villainous puns about Mrs. Cuppy, indulging in saucery; but if I had suspected that there was so strange a being as yourself abroad, I would have added one of my own handiwork and called him in advance a spooney. And further, if I could have dreamed that I would be called a colored person, an accusation which I indignantly deny, I would have continued making this funny kind of crockery until I had enough to set the table—in a roar. But between you and me, and more particularly between me, this subject has been sufficiently dished. To change for a moment from the discussion of pottery to the discussion of Providence. you know that Providence gives to various creatures various gifts; you know that it has given to me large share of wit and humor, but I do not know (knowing you only at all thro' your writings) what the mischief it has given you.

Please publish this as I do love to see myself noticed even if only to be abused. I beg leave to remain, my silly old boy, your caucasianal correspondent, MOFFAT WEIR.

Everyone must confess after reading the above, that the mistake we fell into in supposing "Moffat Weir" to be Professor Gilliard the insane colored gentleman, and terming him "the Bulletin's insane colored correspondent," was a very natural one. We strike out the word colored and pass the title to print, as amended. Moffat Weir is still laboring under the idea that Mrs. Laura Cuppy, the lecturess, and Mrs. Ada Hoyt Foye, the spiritual manifestation "medium," are one and the same character. This is a sad hallucination, but not so terrible as that which he evinces when he says "you know that Providence gives to various creatures various gifts; you know that it has given to me large share of wit and humor." It was just this kind of thing that sent poor Professor Gilliard to Stockton. 'Tis very sad, almost as sad as Moffat Weir's violation of the rules of grammar when he says "particularly between me." However we may tremble for Moffat Weir's liberty, we have discharged our conscience in apologizing to the poor, insane colored man who is still in Stockton whom we accused of writing the letter to which we referred.

A Valuable Californian Product.

There is no end to the productions of California. We supply the world with gold, our grain is exported to many parts of the earth, we shall soon rival China in the production of silk, our wines are drunk by connoisseurs in all countries—California is great. A discovery recently made in Marysville may perhaps lead to California providing materials for the manufacture of all the waterfalls and chignons in the world. The North Californian says that a colored lady a short time ago dropped her water-fall, and on it's being picked up and examined, it was found to be composed of tree moss. If, indeed, tree moss can be so prepared as to be a good imitation of hair, and therefore be made of use in the manufacture of chignons, what cause is there for rejoicing! How much better is a moss chignon than one composed of horrid church-yard hair! There are no gregarines in moss, no pediculi or other unpleasant little insects. It is not yet too late to manufacture some moss chignons for exhibition at Paris, and if the Empress Eugenie takes a fancy to one, and appears wearing it in public, some one's fortune is made. We charge nothing for this suggestion. We have applied for no caveat. We shall ask for no share in the colossal fortune which will doubtless be gained by some practical man who will carry out our idea. Let him make it and keep it. We love to make our fellow-creatures happy.

The Self-Reporting System.

The self-reporting system will not, for the present, be adopted in our public schools. The fact is the "system" must at first be developed more extensively at home. Pa and ma must first set the example. When pa comes home and makes a free and voluntary confession of his shortcomings with his neighbors, and ma comes home and acknowledges, with tears in her eyes, how many holes she has put through various reputations during her morning calls; then and not till then may there be some chance for a similar course of conduct on the part of the offspring. Nineteen hours of criminal secretiveness at home is altogether too heavy a weight in the balance against five hours of self-reporting at school.

Another Alarming Sensation.

The Bulletin has ceased its persecution of the milk-men who poison blessed babies with swill-milk, it is reconciled to the butchers, but declares war against the hackmen who convey small-pox patients in their carriages. Beware of riding in carriages infected with small-pox. Who knows the numbers of the carriages which were used to convey those diseased chinamen to the Small-Pox Hospital?

STORIES OF HISTORICAL EVENTS—FIESCHI AND THE INFERNAL MACHINE.

DURING the last week of the July of 1835, France was full of vague, but the deep and universal apprehensions. On the 28th of July, the fifth anniversary of the revolution of 1830, Louis Philipp, then growing rapidly more despotic and less popular, was to review the National Guard of the Seine and the troops of the garrison of Paris.

There is a heat and oppression in the air before thunder, and also before the outburst of political volcanoes: signs which alarm the thoughtful. The Duchess of Berry's friends were suspected of a wish to remove the wily king. Letters from Hamburg, Berlin, Coblentz, Aix, Chambery, Turin, spoke vaguely of mysterious murmurs of danger, Now it was an ambuscade on the road to Neuilly, then an explosive machine opposite the Ambigu-Comique theatre. Houses were searched, arrests made. The bourgeois dreaded the public anniversary of the Three Days, yet they scarcely knew why. Ministers were anxious; the mouchards (spies) were restlessly watchful; M. Thiers adjured the king to be on his guard; the queen, Amelia, besought him to face the danger. The king, cool in judgment, unimaginative, crafty, bold, brave, and self-willed, turned a deaf ear to all these random rumors, and bantered those who tried to arouse his fears.

On the 28th, the citizen king positively refused to allow any alteration in the place where the review was to be held. He was affable and chatty as usual, did not manifest the slightest apprehension, nor ordered any precaution to be taken; but it was secretly resolved to guard and surround him as if he had been going into an engagement. The only words that Louis Philipp uttered, referring to the review, were on the night before, when postponing some work which one of his librarians wished him to supervise, he said,—

"To-morrow,—at least if I am not killed."

Long impunity had given the king a belief in the futility of conspiracies. The Duke of Orleans shared deeply in the general apprehension, and said to General Baudrand, his first aide-de-camp,—

"General, they threaten to fire at us. My brother and I will keep constantly near the king, and make a rampart for him with our bodies. You and the other officers of the cortege, on your part, on the least movement, must draw close and cover his Majesty."

Even that bravo scarred old veteran, Marshal Mortier, the Duke of Treviso, was nervous. Mortier had been in the retreat from Russia, and, indeed, in all the great battles of the Revolution and the Empire, and, having passed through rains of fire and hailstorms of bullets, had forgotten what fear meant; but still the rumors aroused him. Although the old soldier's health was so bad that only five months before he had been obliged to surrender the presidency of the council, he resisted all the prayers and supplications of his family, and determined to attend the anniversary revie '.

"Yes," he said, with the old fix-bayonet look,—"yes, I shall go. I am a big man, perhaps I shall cover the king."

There is no doubt that these alarms arose from a consciousness of the feelings of the people. You heard the rumors at the marble tables of the cafes, and round the rough deal slabs in the poorest wineshops. In 1833, there had been emeutes at Grenoble, Lyons, Chalons, Marseilles, and at a dozen places. In 1834, two thousand persons were seized or chased ont of France, one hundred and sixty-four political prisoners tried, and four thousand witnesses examined. The press dreaded more chains; justice was interfered with. The prudence of the king in his foreign relations the old Napoleon party maliciously construed into neglect of the dignity and glory of France. Tolerant and wise men thought the king too indiscriminate in his efforts to defend his power from revolutionists.

He swept into his lawyer's net every sort of opponent. He treated his enemies as if they had been God's enemies. There were fears that Justice was not merely to wear the bandage, but also to have her eyes put out. The press was to be gagged and throttled off from truth; there were rumors that the king was going to raise a body-guard, and so defy the bourgeois soldiers, who had burnt powder bravely for him before Charles the Tenth turned his back on Paris. There was no true liberty, then, after all the fighting for it. King Stork had unseated King Log.

The July morning came; the sky was blue and burning, the heat was striking fiercely on the walls of the Tuileries, and the pavin-stones of the boulevards, and the leaves of the trees in the Luxembourg gardens, were languid with the heat. The quick, sharp " tam-tam " of the drums of the National Guard sounded everywhere in the soldierly city, from the Place of the Bastille to the Arc de l'Etoile. The measured tramp of the infantry was heard in the Rue St. Honoré and round the Bourse; behind the Madelaine and past the Louvre the lines of bayonets flashed and glittered; everywhere there was the barriers; children laughed and clapped their hands; grisettes and bones smiled and showed their white teeth; old soldiers drew themselves up stiffly, and assumed a critical air, now and then perhaps passing their hands across their eyes with joy and pride when a son or a nephew (decore) marched or rode past among the "Premiere Legere" or the Cuirassiers, and nodded shako or helmet to them as they passed. The men of Austerlitz, the men of Marengo were there, looking at the youths of the last revolution, and brownfaced striplings fresh from Algiers.

There were many blanks in the ranks of the National Guard, and that indicated mischief and dislike. That keen observer, M. Louis Blanc, says: "The city was alarmed and weighed down, and on every face there was a sort of half-defiant apathy. People were silent and sullen."

At half past ten the mockery of the festival to celebrate a restoration of liberty had begun. As the king passed through the gate of the Tuileries, the grenadiers threw their muskets forward, and presented arms, stiff as statues of iron. The king bowed, and bowed, and still rode on bowing, to encourage the scanty cheering. The king was followed by his three sons, the Dukes of Orleans, Nemours, and Joinville, close to, and watchful of, their father. Then came old Marshal Mortier, the Grand Chancellor of the Legion of Honor, against whom steel and lead had been powerless for sixty years. He, too, looked on the alert, and watched the populace and the blouses suspiciously, ready to throw himself before the king, on whom he wasted his devotion. There were three other marshals rode near him,—Count Loban, the Marquis Maison, Minister of the War, and the Count Molitor.

The National Guards were cold and silent. About half past twelve the cortege reached the boulevard of the Temple. An immense crowd of every age and both sexes crowded the roadways and the alleys, and filled every window. The poorer the district the more eager and numerous the crowd. Opposite the Jardin Turc, the space being large, the mob was enormous, and many well-dressed women filled the terrace.

The king was just passing a tree opposite the last of a block of buildings adjoining a two-storied cafe. There was nothing remarkable about the house; it was a small mean strip of building, three stories high, with a dirty awning over the bottom shop, which was the lowest order of cabaret. The last window but one had the usual Parisian outside shutters, and the top windows were open, with a dingy Venetian blind trailing out and held up from within half a foot of bottom.

All at once from no one knows where, comes a sound like a badly executed volley, mingled with a sort of muffled report. In a moment there is a terrible gap in the king's escort, and there arise cries of rage and terror, for the boulevard is strewn with dead and dying men and horses. Men have fallen behind and round the king, but he and his sons are unhurt. In the lane facing the house, and under the terrace of the Turkish Garden, a rain of shot had in the same way cut a path through the crowd.

The excitement was almost maddening. The spectators and the National Guards flew in all directions, as if an ambuscade battery had opened upon them and was about to fire again. A whirlwind of fear swept the boulevard. Had the earth opened, or fire fallen from heaven? No one knew what had happened. But there lay the heap of torn and bleeding men, and there was the wall of smoke still drifting from the window where the blind was lifted for air. Lenormand had been right after all; the popular terror had some foundation. This was the blow that was threatened. And what was to follow? In a moment the more resolute men, the soldiers especially, who are accustomed to any suddenness of death, threw themselves upon the door of No. 50, from whose top window the smoke still kept breaking out in thick whiffs.

The king was unhurt, all but a graze on the forehead from a bullet. The mane of his horse had also been skimmed by a shot. The horse, starting, had struck the king's arms against the head of Duc de Nemour's horse, and for a moment Louis thought that he was hit. The horses of the two princes, who rode forward eager for their father's safety were also grazed; but he relieved their anxiety by a few words. Then with one look of deep grief at the carnage around him, the king rode forward, reassuring the National Guards by his presence and his words.

When the crowd of citizens and soldiers went to raise the wounded, they found forty persons had been struck and nineteen mortally wounded. The nineteen included the following: Poor old Marshal Mortier, sixty-seven years old, struck by a ball that had penetrated his left ear; traversed the muscles of his neck, and fractured his second cervical vertebra; Marquis Lachasse de Verigny, aged sixty, struck in the head by a bullet, and his horse killed by five balls in the neck; the marquis died that night. Colonel Raffe, of the gendarmerie of the Seine, aged fifty-six; he expired in the night. Count Oscar de Villette, captain of artillery, thirty-four years old; skull fractured by two slugs. Rieusse, a lieutenant-colonel of the 8th legion of National Guards,—a great sportsman and proprietor of a horse-breeding establishment at Virolflay; killed by three bullets. Labrosse, seventy-two years old, a tax collector of the 6th arrondissement, struck in the right arm and abdomen; died two days after. Leger, mathematical instrument maker, and grenadier of the 8th legion: killed on the spot. Prudhomme, marble cutter, and sergeant of grenadiers; dead. Ricard, wine merchant and grenadier; dead. Brunot and Inglar, weavers; dead. Ardouin, a journalist; dead. Madame Ledernet; shot in the thigh. Madame Briosne, four wounds in the thighs. Madame Langoray, a workwoman, mother of four children, one of whom was in her arms when she fell dead. Rose Alison, a servant; wounded in the thigh. Louise Josephine Remy, a little girl of fourteen; dead. Leclerc, an apprentice of thirteen years old, died a month afterwards.

The twenty-three wounded consisted of five superior officers, eight National Guards, five workmen, three children and five women; there were all ages and all classes, generals and bakers, a chef d'escadron and a dyer, the son of a mayor and a street gamin; a lady fell beside her dying husband and a dead sister; there were wounds of every kind, in the breast and on the head, thighs and feet, hands and mouth. A hair-breadth of difference in the elevation of the ambuscade battery, and more than two hundred persons would have been mowed down by that storm of slugs and bullets; a second sooner, and the king must have fallen, riddled by shots.

Before the wounded and the dead could be removed to the hospital of St. Louis or the neighboring houses, No. 50 had been surrounded by a crowd of enraged and shouting men, commissaries of police, police agents, National Guards, and maddened citizens. All the doors were at once blocked up by the crowd; the ground floor and the first floor, where Mr. Durant's wine shop was ransacked and searched in every part. Mr. Jacquemin, a commissary of the police, was the first to ascend to the third floor. A kick or two of his foot, and the barricaded door fell in, and M. Jacquemin and three Municipal Guards, seven or eight National Guards, and M. Bessas Lamegie, mayor of the 10th arrondisrement, rushed in. The first two rooms were empty; in the third, which was thick with smoke, they found at the open window a rough framework, like a clumsy table with the top removed; in this had been screwed twenty-five gun-barrels; some of these were split and shattered, almost all displaced by the terrible explosion. On the right-hand side was a fireplace, in which blazed a fire of straw and wood. The police, suspecting some trap in a fire too large for a garret on a hot July day, at once scattered and put out the fagots.

As the men's eyes grew accustomed to the thick, sulphurous smoke oozing from hell itself, as it seemed to their excited minds, they saw that the room was empty, but that there were smears of fresh blood on the wall. On the floor, near the door, lay a pierced gray hat, with pieces of torn gun-barrel near it. All at once M. Jacquemin, crying " they are here," springs on a door in the wall facing the window, but it proved to be only a large cupboard containing some straw and a mattress. Returning through the two rooms, the soldiers and police found on the left hand a small kitchen, with a window looking out upon the court yard. Here also there was a hat pierced with fragments of gun-barrels and there were prints of fresh blood. There is a ladder in one corner, and a trap-door in the ceiling. This monster of evil, this last embodiment of Satan must be there. M. Jacquemin is mounting the ladder, when Corporal Dautrep of the Municipal Guard, draws him back.

" If they are there," he says, " I am armed."

He mounts with sword drawn and pistol ready. His comrades wait impatiently for his cry for help; but there is nothing there but a portmanteau that has held gun-barrels, a hammer, a flask basket, and a sealed letter. Just then, a soldier, looking out at the window, finds a rope hanging down into the court below. It is covered, in places, with blood, and the police at once feel sure that the assassins have escaped in that direction.

Whilst all this was going on, Daudin, a sharp officer, who had run into the court of the fatal Maison Travaut with some men of his brigade, hears Lefevre, one of his police agents, crying—

" I see a man dropping from a rope into the next court."

Lefevre and a comrade named Devillers instantly climbed on to the roof of the shed that looked into the next yard, while Daudin went round by another door to the door of the Café des Milles Colonnes, next door, when he was arrested by mistake, and led off to the Chateau d'Eau. In the meantime, the two agents had come upon a short stoutly built man, staggering from a dreadful gaping wound in his temple, and trying with both hands to press back the blood that was gushing down over his eyes. He could make no resistance, and was at once led to the Chateau d'Eau with bayonets held to his breast.

They found on him six francs fifty centimes, a packet of gunpowder, a knife with a horn handle, a pair of green spectacles, a watch, and a life-preserver made of cord and weighted with lead. In the confusion of numerous arrests, the man contrived unobserved to throw a poignard with a silver handle under a camp-bed.

The indignation at the hideous fanaticism, the bloodthirsty vanity, of such a patriot as Girard, and all who instigated or aided him, was deep and heartfelt. The people felt that the king represented, however imperfectly, peace, order, and prosperity, and that without him anarchy and murder must reign supreme. The National Guards, who that very morning had been so cold and silent, were now loud and enthusiastic in their cheers, and as the king rode mournfully back to the Tuileries, shakos waved on thousands of bayonets, and the "Vive le Roi!" ran deafening from street to street. In a letter to Marshal Lobau, the king sopke ominously of the murder:

"Frenchmen," the king wrote, "the National Guard and the army are mourning; French families are sorrowing. A frightful spectacle has laecrated every heart. An old warrior, an old friend, spared by the fires of a hundred battles, has fallen by my side struck by the blows that the assassin destined for me. In their desire to reach me, they have immolated glory, honor, and patriotism, peaceful citizens, women, and children; yes, Paris has seen her best blood shed in the same spot and on the same day on which it was poured five years ago to maintain the laws of the country." The very day of the attempt the Chamber of Peers was organized as a court of justice to try the conspirators, under the presidency of Baron Pasqueir.

The prisoner was twice examined the day of the massacre, first at No. 50, then in the Conciergerie. At first faint and bleeding, he could only feebly hold up his fingers in reply to the questions. He implied that he was alone in the plot; that he had been for weeks making the infernal machine; that it was his own idea alone. He then fell back fainting; no more could at that time be got out of him.

In the evening, bandaged and slightly stronger, he confessed that he had had accomplices, but declared that he alone held the blind up and fired the train. He was a republican. The agony of his wounds then compelled the doctors to forbid the wretch being tortured by further questions. The next morning the man was better, and could speak. He said his name was Joseph Francis Girard, and his wife and child were at Lodéve, near Montpellier. He was thirty-nine years of ago. The judge representing the enormity of the crime, Girard cried, with broken words:

"I am an unfortunate man. I am miserable. I can hope for nothing. I may render a service. We shall see. I regret what I have done. I may perhaps stop something. I will name no one. I will sell no one. My crime has been too much for my reason. He confessed that the newspapers had excited him to the crime. He spoke of the émeutes in the Rue Transnanain and at Lyons.

It was still doubtful whether Girard had really had accomplices. One man declared he had seen three persons at the window, and others imagined they saw conspirators escaping over the roof toward the Rue des Fosses du Temple. The portmanteau that contained the gun-barrels was the great clew upon which the police relied. It had been brought to Girard three or four days before the crime, and Girard said it came from his wife, and contained linen and brandy. A waterman at the cabriolet stand in the Rue Vendome had carried it from the corner of the Rue Charlot to No. 50 in the Temple boulevard. It was a wooden trunk, four feet long, covered with black skin, and very heavy.

A commissioner was also found who, on the morning of the 28th of July, had brought the trunk back from No. 5 to the Place Vendome. The cabman he had ordered to drive to the Place Maubert; but on the way he changed the order to the Palace aux Veaux, near the Port aux Tuiles. A cooper's boy had helped him to put the box on his shaulder, and he walked towards the Rue Saint Victor. There the clew was lost, for Girard himself refused to say where he had taken the trunk to a marble-worker named Nolland, No. 13, Rue de Poissy. Girard, whom he had only seen once, came to him with the trunk, telling him if it was not sent for in an hour not to give up without an order from M. Morey, a harness-maker, No. 23, Rue St. Victor, who came for it.

Here was another clew. Nollahd, taken to the Rue Croulebarbe, pointed to 10, at the corner of the Rue Chant de l'Alonette. The scent got hotter, The people there remembered Nolland's friend, a Corsican, named Fieschi, a short man, with brown beard and hair, and a southern pronunciation. He had lived an infamous life with a woman named Petit, who had a young daughter with one eye, since living in the Salpetriere, He had been the terror of the place, and used to boast of an infamous condemnation before a military tribunal. The judge's eyes sparkled. This was the man. Nolland, being taken to the prison at once recognized Girard as his old neighbor of the Rue Croulebarbe. Morey's porter identified the fourth story of No. 11 in the Rue du Long Pont as the place to which he had taken the trunk. The police found there a young girl with one eye, named Nina Lassave, Fieschi's last mistress.

The trunk was found in the room; she had just written on a scrap of paper her intention of killing herself, Morey having deserted her after giving her sixty francs to go to Lyons and hide herself. The trunk had contained Fieschi's clothes and account-books, which she had pawned. The gun-barrels were identified as rejected government barrels. purchased by Mr. Bury, a gunsmith in No. 58 Rue de l'Arbre Sec, and a pupil in the Temple testified to Girard and Morey buying the trunk found at Nina Lassave's. A woman, who had been with Nina to the review, declared that she returned trembling and distracted with grief, hearing that the murderer was killed.

On the 5th of August, Nina confessed the whole. On the 26th; she went to see her hideous lover, and found him at work at some machine, as she thought, in the ordinary way of his trade. Fieschi told her not to come to Paris during the fetes, as there would be disturbances; and, if she came, he said he would not receive her. His manner seemed altered, and he looked careworn. She, however, went the next day, and the porter told her that Fieschi was then shut up with his uncle, an old gentleman (Morey), and they had given orders that they would see no one. Some minutes after she saw Morey and Fieschi sitting together drinking beer under the tent of a cafe. Fieschi, then more gloomy than ever, came up and told her he could not receive her.

The next day, feeling sure the fire had come from Fieschi's window at No. 50, she lost her head, feeling sure her only friend was dead; and, packing up her few things at the Salpetriére, returned to Paris to see the friends whom Fieschi had told her to consult on emergencies. She first called on Pepin, a grocer, No. 1, Faubourg St. Antoine. Not finding him at home, she went, all in tears, to Morey, who said to her.

"Well, what is the matter? It was Fieschi, then, who fired the thing? Is he dead?" Morey denied all knowledge of the matter. He afterwards, however, owned that he had been with Fieschi on the Monday, and then took the girl to a wine shop, outside the Barriére du Trone to talk to her more privately.

Nina said: "What a dreadful thing—so many victems! They say General Mortier was so good."

"He was canaille, like the rest."

"It was cruel to kill fifty persons to get at one. I, who am only a woman, if I had wished to kill Louis Philippe, should have taken two pistols, and, after having fired with one, I should have shot myself with the other."

"Hush! We sha'n't lose by waiting: and he'll give up his body-guard. Fieschi is an imbecile; he would load three of the guns himself, and it is just those that burst. I urged him to load his pistols. He ought to have blown out his brains. He is only a braggart. He went and told in several places that something was going to happen on the day of the review: that was wrong.

"But how did Fieschi, who was engineer, construct such a machine as that?"

"It was I who traced the plan. I have only just torn it up or I would show it you. The guns were placed in such a way that they could not miss; but Fieschi fired too late."

On his way to dinner outside the barrier, Morey had stopped at a paper manufacturer's to return a passport to a man named Bescher which Fieschi had borrowed. Coming back, Morey stopped at the corner of a wall to throw away a bag of bullets he had in his pocket.

Pepin, the grocer, was found in his shirt only, hidden in a concealed cupboard at Magny. He had with him two blouses for disguise, nine hundred and fifty francs, and a volume of the works of St. Just. Pepin had already been under accusation for having, in 1832, permitted the insurgents to fire from his windows in the faubourg at the troops. The police also arrested Victor Boireau, a tinman a member of the dangerous society of the Right of Man. It was he who, on one of Pepin's horses, had trotted and galloped past No. 5, in order that Fieschi and Morey might regulate the level of the gun-barrels. Bescher, a bookbinder, who had lent his passport to Fieschi, was also arrested.

The trial took place before the Peers, under the presidency of M. Pasquier, on the 30th of January. So great was the interest excited in Paris that applications were made to the grand referendary for seventeen thousand five hundred tickets.

Fieschi, now the blood was washed off, and the plaster and poultices removed, appeared a short muscular man with a high, narrow, forehead, hollow eyes, livid face, and thin, pointed nose. His Corsican face gave him a diabolical likeness to a degraded Napoleon. His black hair was cut very short, and shaved over the left temple, where the wound had exposed the brain; a second wound had gashed his left eyebrow; a third splinter had ripped the left corner of his mouth. and gave it a sardonic grinning expression. His left eye was closed and seemed lower than the other. His little eyes were quick as those of a rat, and much hidden by the brows. This monster of bloodthirsty vanity, calling itself patriotism, wore a black satin waistcoat and black cravat. He took snuff perpetually, and kept arranging a portfolio of paper with gay and smiling alacrity. He was never still a moment, constantly rising up, and sitting down, or turning his head from this side to that. He shook hands with his counsel, offered snuff to his guards, and seemed piqued at their refusal. He assumed the air of a great man, whose actions, though mistaken, had been in pursuit of a grand idea.

Morey, an old man on the point of dying from a terrible disease, had a calm fearless manner, and was treated with consistent respect by Fieschi, whose death, however, he had no doubt planned by overloading three of the barrels. Pepin, a mild, talkative, weak man, looked pale and miserably apprehensive. Bescher was careless; Boireau, a very young man, energetic, eloquent and assured.

Fieschi, in some vague hope of being received as evidence, confessed, in the course of the trial, the whole progress of the crime. It was a plan struck out by Morey as early as 1824. It was originally a mere soldier's scheme.

"I said to myself one day, 'If I was in a fortress with five hundred men, and an epidemic came and carried off half of them, could I defend the place with a few people left?' I had then a idea of mounting ninety muskets in a row. With that, thought I, I can destroy a whole regiment with a few men. Morey's wife saw me at it and told Morey, who came and asked me what it was. I replied, a machine that could demolish Charles the Tenth and all his family. It was complicated, however, being ranged in batteries, and made for flint-locks. I explained it to Morey, and he said, 'That would do very well for Louis Philippe.' He put the model in his pocket, but he did not say what he should do with do it."

It was then arranged between Pepin, Morey, and Fieshi, and the expense of the whole plot coldly and carefully estimated at five hundred francs. They met one day, after dinner, at Pepin's appointment, in the cemetery of Pere la Chaise, to make experiments as to the best way of firing trains of powder. Afraid of being seen there, they went up into the vineyards. Morey drew out his "pear" (small powder horn) and spread the powder. Pepin struck a light that went out. Fieschi then lighted the powder in the middle, and his comrades seeing the good effect, cried at once, "Ca va bien!" "And certainly no way is quicker and sharper than that," added the witness. They afterwards drank together at a restaurant at the Barriere de Montreail.

The sums advanced to Fieschi were found in Pepin's books entered as paid to "the Dauber," as Fieschi was nicknamed from his grimness at his first interview with Madame Pepin. Boireau lent tools to pierce the touch-holes of two of the barrels. Morey had regretted he had not money enough to carry out another project. He had wanted to hire a house next the Chamber of Deputies, and blow up the king and the princes the day of the opening of the Chambers. He also said (he was a celebrated leader at shooting matches) that if he once got the king at the end of his gun, he'd take good care not to miss him.

Fieschi especially insisted on his not being a mere hired assassin.

"No," he said; "I worked, I gained my bread even while I was about to make this attempt. I shall pass in the eyes of the world as a great criminal not as an assassin. I do not deserve the name of assassin. An assassin is a man who kills to get money, but I—I am a great criminal—un graud coupable. I declaro that I received nothing from anybody. They shall never say that I am a stabber. I had goods from Pepin, but I paid for them; they were only sugar and trifles."

Fieschi met the Prince de Rohan also at Pepin's, who came, as Pepin said, to discuss some new machine for decorticating vegetables, but more probably for political purposes

It was about five o'clock in the afternoon of the 27th when Morey arrived with the powder and bullets. The guns were loaded for the most part by Morey. The mounting and loading took up till after six. Morey then went out, keeping his handkerchief to his mouth. He also took off his July decoration, and turned his back to people as much as possible to prevent being recognized. The barrels that burst were found to have been loaded with intervals purposely left between the powder and the bullets, so that they might explode and Fieschi be destroyed. At eleven o'clock that night, after leaving Boireau and his experiment of riding past, Fieschi went home and tried to sleep, vexed and alarmed at Pepin's disclosures to Boirean.

The next morning very early, Fieschi went to a young Corsican, named Sorba, to ask him to be his second in a duel. It was only a pretext to obtain society; for Sorba was too young, and he dared not confide his fears to him.

At half past nine Fieschi met Boireau again on the boulevards. Boireau left the friends with whom he was, and said to Fieschi,—

"We are all ready. You go to your work: we shall be at our posts."

Fieschi then met Morey on the Rue Basse du Rempart. Morey proposed, after all was demolished, to destroy the telegraphs, to set fire to the barns in the banliere, and to attack the National Guard when they came to put out the fires.

Morey said that when the government was once free, the world would be happy, and the nation rich. Small fortunes were to be left alone; but when a man had a million, all beyond three hundred thousand francs were to be thrown into the national funds. Pepin clapped him on the back, and said, "Mon brave, you shall be recompensed." But Fieschi replied, the government was not to be shut up in a snuff-box. There would be civil wars, and all he wished was to win glory at the head of one hundred or two hundred men and chase the stranger from the Rhine, and drive off the Cossacks, who were jealous of France. Pepin then declared that the heads of all supporters of monarchy must roll along the streets like paving-stones.

On the 15th of February, the seventeenth audience, the Court brought a verdict of guilty against all the prisoners but Bescher, who was acquitted; Fieschi, Morey, and Pepin were condemned to death; Boireau to twenty year's detention, and to be for the rest of his life under the surveillance of the police. Morey heard his sentence with calm indifference, Pepin, with assurances of his innocence, Fieschi with vain and verbose assurances of repentance.

He had become a lion of the day, and keenly relished the popularity he had acquired so dearly. Even the peers applauded some of his sallies. With distorted face and sardonic smile he watched eagerly for his moments of recrimination or self-assertion.

The antecedents of Fieschi were soon unravelled. He was a Corsican of Genoese extraction, born at Murato in 1790. His father, a condemned criminal, had died in voluntary exile. One of the assassin's brothers fell at Wagram; his only sister was blind. A second brother, born dumb, was so heart broken with grief at the news of Fieschi's crime, that he remained two whole days without taking food.

Fieschi was originally a goatherd, but, being quick and adventurous, soon left Corsica, enlisted in a regiment of light infantry at Naples, and, displaying much zeal and courage, became regimental staff-sergeant by the time he was nineteen. Entering Murrat's Guards, he distinguished himself by great courage in the campaigns of 1812 and 1814, and won the decoration of the Two Sicilies. In 1815, Fieschi deserted to the Austrians, and his information, it is said, contributed to his old master's defeat at Tolentino. When Murat was at Vescovato, Fieschi rejoined him, and was sent on important secret service to Naples. His reports encouraged Murat to his rash and fatal expedition. On landing a Pizzo, Fieschi requested leave to go first and reconoitre, and a very short time after Murat was shot down by the gendarmes of Montelcone.

Traitor or not, the man did not thrive. He returned to Corsica a beggar, to wrangle with his brother-in-law for a share of the fraternal heritage. Unable to obtain even a sou, Fieschi took the law trooper, drove off a cow belonging to his brother, and sold it openly in the market-place. Brought before a magistrate, he produced forged papers to prove his right, and was in consequence arrested and sent to Bastia. Here he escaped to the mountains by leaping from a window twenty feet from the ground.

In 1816, when only twenty-six years old, Fieschi was condemned to ten years' imprisonment at Embrun, and to police supervision for life. At Embrun he learnt the trade of a cloth-maker; and when he was released, breaking the ban, he went to Lodeve, and practised his trade. From there he went to the royal manufactory at Villelouvette, conducting himself there well, and with a pretence of religion. Coming to Paris, he obtained help from his old commander, and became porter at a newspaper office, and a spy of the police

It was at this time that he sought help of Morey, and described himself as wretched as the dog that looks for food at a street corner. Most men, he afterwards said, in such misery, must have gone mad or thrown themselves out of window. It was in this poverty and despair that men like Morey took advantage of his cunning, recklessness, and inordinate vanity. The government observing that a short of boastful gratitude was a leading point in his character, persuaded him to disclose the plot to his old benefactor, M. Ladvocat.

The king, in acknowledgment, forgave Fieschi the parricide's penalty of wearing a black veil on the scaffold, and walking to the guillotine with bare feet. While he was undergoing de toilette, he merely said,—

"Is it not heart-breaking that I should be the first executed for political causes since 1830? I would rather have remained on the field at Berisina."

Pepin was cruelly bound in the camisole. While his hair was being cut off, he said to Fieschi,—

"I am your victim."

Fieschi was going to reply, but his confessor stopped him. Fieschi then threw himself at Pepin's feet, and begged him to tell the whole truth, as he had done, that he might appear before God without fear.

Pepin heaved a sigh and replied, "No, I can say nothing. I will not compromise fathers of families."

As for Morey, he was so weak that he had to be lifted on to the scaffold; but he said calmly,—

"It is not courage I want, but legs."

The scaffold had only been erected at a quarter before seven; at a quarter past eight the execution took place in the Place de Jacques, before a vast crowd that filled every avenue. Pepin was calm and resigned, and declared his innocence to the last.

"Since I must die, I will die. I have nothing more to say," he replied to the police agent, who, while he was being strapped to the plank, still urged him to confessions. He died first.

Morey then ascended, calm and imperturble; the plank went down, the old man's neck was clipped by the lunette,—a second head rolled into the sawdust.

Fieschi told to the people that he had told the truth, and died without fear. Fieschi left his head to Nina Lassave, in order that she might benefit by the sale of plaster-casts taken from it.

The massive oak frame of the infernal machine, with its split gun-barrels may still be seen at Madame Tassand's, that indefatigable old lady having instantly pounced on the relic of a remarkable crime.

The infernal machine was not an original thought of Fieschi's for, in the year 1789, a watchmaker named Brillon, being expelled from the Arquebusier's Company at Senlis, determined on revenge. He fired a train of gun-barrels at the procession as it passed his window, shot a man who broke into his barricaded room, and then blew up the house with all who were in it. The only man who escaped was the soldier who tried to drag him out, and he had twenty wounds, an eye knocked out, and a knee-pan broken.

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

THE SIX DAYS OF CREATION.

THAT once famous book, Nott and Gliddon's "Types of Mankind," contained a criticism of the Mosaic account of the Creation, in which it was declared that the writer of said account made a sad blunder when he represented light as being created three whole days before the sun and moon were ordained to give light upon the earth. We remember astonishing the pious and pretty young lady who had charge of the infant class in the Sunday School where we received rudimentary instruction in theology a great many years ago, by making a somewhat similar criticism, suggested by the circumstance that in reading "round the class" the third and sixteenth verses of the first chapter of Genesis, fell to our "turn" in the same lesson. We also have a recollection that the decidedly unsatisfactory character of the explanation furnished on that occasion (after a whispered consultation between my youthful instructor and the gray-haired Superintendent) sowed the seeds of doubt in our mind, and finally made us in our eighth year, a precocious but avowed sceptic. Professor Chadbourne, in his recent work on "Natural Theology"* makes a more ingenious explanation of the apparent inconsistency, than the one we have alluded to, and, indeed, his comments upon the Mosaic record of the "Six Days" are so striking that we are tempted to quote them almost entire, as being likely to interest those who are curious in such matters.

After prefacing that our globe must have had a long history before any permanent records were left in the sedimentary rocks, and that it is by the light of chemistry alone, that we can thread our way back beyond the positive record of geologic formations, Professor Chadbourne proceeds to reason from the known chemical principles and from the physical forces of matter, in order to arrive at the facts in regard to this early period, just as the geologists reason from the remains of plants and animals in the various strata, in attempting to unfold the later history of the globe.

Quoting the second verse of the first chapter of Genesis, And the earth was without form and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep, he says:

"It seems as though every chemist must believe that there was a time when the materials of our earth, and probably of the solar system, floated in space in a gaseous form. If so, no language could better describe the condition:

'Emptiness and desolation'—'Without form and void.'

And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, or fluids, which would represent all the materials of which the globe would ultimately be formed. God is represented as acting directly, because the forces are only his method of action. Now every scientific man knows, that if the materials existed in a gaseous form according to the theory of Laplace, the first force called into action would be gravitation—that force that binds planets in their orbits, and from which the invisible atom cannot escape. The rushing together of these elements under the action of this force, which gives the earth its form, might well be called the moving of the Spirit of God. If God is the Creator of the earth and the controller of all its changes, no language could be better chosen to represent movements produced by this force, which must necessarily have been the first called into action to bring the particles together. For it is gravitation alone that acts upon all matter and at all distances.

Now when this force was brought into action, we look into the nature of matter by the light of chemistry to see what results would follow. And when we have transcribed the words of Moses, we have the exact result which the latest revelations of science show must have followed.

'And God said, Let there be light; and there was light.'

Light is not spoken of as something created, but as a result. When the materials of which this globe is composed were brought together by gravitation, the simple condensation and chemical action both combined to produce light and heat. The rocks and waters of the globe are the result of combustion. We have seen the compound blow-pipe in which iron burns like straw, and platinum vanishes in vapor. That flame is simply the union of oxygen with hydrogen when only enough combines to form a few drops of water. Who can conceive of the heat produced when the waters that fill the ocean were formed? We have seen the light when the fine wire of iron or steel or magnesium is burned; how must the very heavens have been filled with light when the materials of which all our rocks were formed were burning! We think of the waters and rocks as incombustible, but we must constantly remember that they are the products of combustion; and all we have to do is to discompose them and bring the elements together again, to have that intense combustion on a small scale which lighted up primeval darkness, when the mighty mass of elements that compose this globe was brought into action. For ages the earth must have remained a blazing gaseous globe. It may be said this is theory; but it is a theory that rests upon a most substantial basis, the chemical nature of the water and the rocks of the earth. We only state that we believe to be the necessary result of bringing the materials of the globe together. It is what we should believe if the Bible had never been written."

If this theory of the mode in which the earth was formed is correct, Professer Chadbourne insists that "it must have been ages before any essential change occurred, or at least any change so great as to be reckoned a "new order of things." And this period, whatever its duration may have been, the writer regards as "the geologic day," or the yom which King James' translators have rendered "day," in the first chapter of Genesis, and which same word yom is used in the second chapter to represent an epoch or indefinite period. This attempt to regard the Mosaic "day" as an age or geological era, is sometimes spoken of as a concession wrong from the theologians by modern science, but the fact is that this interpretation is older than the reformation' and was maintained by Christian Commentators before the English language existed. The writer's remarks on the next step in the work of creation, are equally ingenious:

"It is plain that chemistry is the only science that can possibly guide us in unravelling the first day's work of creation, the production of light; and it is by the same science mainly that we are to trace the changes still further, until we find in the sedimentary rocks evidence of the mechanical action of water. And what would be the changes which must have occurred after the mingling and union of the elements which we have described as the first epoch or day of creation?

We know well what changes must have occurred, if the laws of matter were the same then as now. As heat was radiated from the glowing earth into space, the whole mass was gradually cooled, until the materials of which the rocks are composed became simply a melted ball; the air, the waters of the earth, and all volatile substances, still forming a dense cloud around its whole surface. Still latter a crust was formed upon this globe by cooling, and waters were condensed upon it, covering the entire globe. For continents and mountains were impossible till the crust in after years became thick enough to hold its place when thrown up. For countless ages that crust must have thickened beneath the waters that grew deeper and deeper as the lower temperature of the globe allowed more and more to be condensed from the air, until the atmosphere, with a perfect ocean beneath and dense clouds above, took its place as a divider of the waters which it holds to-day. Thus by the natural change of the globe was produced the condensation and separation of the mingled elements, until the two permanent gases which were prepared to constitute the atmosphere were left mainly free, and had gained their proper place, and had commenced one of their great offices in the machinery of creation.

How now do the words of the Bible correspond with this description which we have made, guided by the known laws of nature?

'And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters.'

The word translated firmament means simply expanse, anything that is spread out. And the criticism that has been made that Moses taught that there was a solid sphere above us, has no foundation in the Holy Scriptures. That doctrine belongs to a latter day, if not to a heathen philosophy.

The great office of this firmament is to-day what it was when first separated from the condensing elements. It is the great water-bearer. From the water beneath go up the unseen streams, till in the colder upper regions they condense in clouds and pour down their treasures upon the earth. All the springs and rivers are pouring back into the ocean the mighty tide which this firmament has separated from the waters beneath, are poured down as from open windows in the heavens. Were it not for this office of the atmosphere the earth would be a desert. And all the vast accumulations of sedimentary rocks over the whole globe are evidence of the work it has done in dividing and transporting the waters, through all geologic ages. This was its first appointed work, to divide the waters from the waters, and thus to prepare the globe for man. And we have in the lowest stratified rocks evidence of its work before any life appeared upon the earth.

And when now the swift thunder-cloud pours down its deluge, or the wide-spread storm-cloud pours down, day after day, its torrents, until the swollen rivers cannot contain the abundance, it is the firmament established of old, that divides the waters beneath from the waters above.

* Lectures on Natural Theology; or, Nature and the Bible, from the same Author. By P. A. Chadbourne. New York: G. P. Putnam & Son. San Francisco: A. Roman & Co.

When ages have rolled away, the earth covered with the ocean, and far above with a thick canopy of cloud, the crust becomes thick enough to keep its place, when lifted by forces beneath, or by the contraction of the cooling mass within. Now it is possible for dry land to appear; not only possible, but the necessary result of the continued cooling of the arth."

After going through the entire six days, with the same minuteness, Professor Chadbourne sums up as follows:

"But, before the close of the sixth day, the record is: 'And God said, Let us make man in our own image after our likeness.' The appearance of man, then, according to the Bible, was the closing scene in the great drama of creation.

Now, without entering into the disputed question of chronology as to the number of years man has been upon the earth, or of the unity of the race, we know of no scientific man who does not consider that man was the last term in the series, whether he believes in development or direct creation. Man is not only the last term that has appeared, but he is the last term possible, according to the plan of structure sketched in the first fish of the Silurian waters. We have then the six great epochs completed. If there had been in the universe some intelligent being like man, before whose eyes the whole scene of creation could have passed, the grand pictures that would have attracted his attention would have been in the order we have described.

First. The gathering of the elements by the mighty, all-prevading force of gravitation, giving a world of light.

Second. The condensation of the globe and the waters upon it, so that the atmosphere should take its place as the divider of waters.

Third. The forming of dry land and the appearance of plants, increasing in quantity till they culminated in that abundant vegetation that covered the land in the coal period, stretching, as it must have stretched, from pole to pole, wherever land appeared.

Fourth. The appearance in the heavens of the sun and moon and stars, to do their appointed work while the world should staud.

Fifth. The abundance of animal life filling the waters.

Sixth. The sudden increase of life upon the land, in animals huge in size and higher in orgauization than any that had before appeared; and finally, the appearance of man, with such powers that he was the lord and master of all.

If, now, that being had been called upon to give an account of the whole scene in the limits of a single chapter, could he have exceeded in accuracy and fullness the description given by Moses? We have seen a part of the changes produced through the operations of natural forces. Moses carries us one step further back to Him who holds the forces in His hand.

We feel justified in applying to this grand epic of the creation, the substance of the language which Humboldt applied to the hundred and fourth Psalm.

We are astonished to fiud, in a description of such limited extent, the whole geological history of the earth so accurately sketched by a few bold touches."

JOHN STUART MILL'S COUNSEL TO THE STUDENTS OF ST. ANDREWS.

Probably no address to students has ever attracted so much attention as that of John Stuart Mill on the occasion of his inauguration as Rector of the University of St. Andrews. The appeal with which it closes, exhibits a striking contrast in its almost emotional character, to Mr. Mill's ordinary restrained manner. It is well worth the attention of every student. Even in the concluding sentences, the spirit of which is stoical and that of a heathen rather than of a Christian philosopher there is a certain elevation and grandeur which even minds constitutionally antagonistic, cannot fail to appreciate. The address concludes thus:

"Now is your opportunity for gaining an insight into subjects larger and far more ennobling than the minutiæ of a business or profession, and for acquiring a facility of using your minds on all that concerns the higher interests of a man, which you will carry with you into the occupations of active life, and which will prevent even the short intervals of time which that may leave you from being altogether lost for noble purposes. Having once conquered the first difficulties, the only ones of which the irksomeness surpasses the interest; having turned the point beyond which what was once a task becomes a pleasure; in even the busiest after-life the higher powers of your mind will make progress imperceptibly, by the spontaneous exercise of your thoughts, and by the lessons you will know how to learn from daily experience. So, at least, it will be if in your early studies you have fixed your eyes upon the ultimate end from which those studies take their chief value—that of making you more effective combattants in the great fight which never ceases to rage between Good and Evil, and more equal to coping with the ever new problems which the changing course of human society present to be resolved. Aims like these commonly retain the footing they have once established in the mind, and their presence in our thoughts keeps our higher facultics in exercise, and makes us consider the acquiremeuts and powers which we store up at any time in our lives as a mental capital, to be freely expended in helping forward any mode which presents itself of making mankind in any respect wiser or better, or placing any portion of human affairs on a more sensible and rational footing than its existing one. There is not one of us who may not qualify himself so to improve the average amount of opportunities as to leave his fellow-creatures some little the better for the use he has kuown how to make of his intellect. To make this little greater, let us strive to keep ourselves acquainted with the best thonghts that are brought forth by the original minds of the age, that we may know what movements stand most in need of our aid, and that, as far as depends on us, the good seed may not fall on a rock, and perish without reaching the soil in which it might have germinated and flourished. You are to be a part of the public who are to welcome, encourage, and help forward the future intellectual benefactors of humanity; and you are, if possible, to furnish your contingent to the number of those benefactors. Nor let any one be discouraged by what may seem, in moments of despondency, the lack of time and of opportunity. Those who know how to employ opportunities will often find that they can create them; and what we achieve depends less on the amount of time we possess than on the use we make of our time. You aod your like are the hope and resource of your country in the coming generation; all great things which that generation is destined to do, have to be done by some like you; several will assuredly be done by persons for whom society has done much less, to whom it has given far less preparation than those whom I am now addressing. I do not attempt to instigate you by the prospect of direct rewards, either earthly or heavenly; the less we think about being rewarded in either way the better for us. But there is one reward which will not fail you, because it is not a consequence, but is inherent in the very fact of deserving it; the deeper and more varied interest you will feel in life; which will give it tenfold its value, and a value which will last to the end. All merely personal objects grow less valuable as we advance in life: this not only endures, but increases."

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE Dickens rivalries are going forward with extraordinary activity. Ticknor & Field's Diamond edition have had an immense sale; so have Peterson's, printed in thin octavos; and now Hurd and Honghton are in the field with three different styles, called the Household, the Globe, and the Riverside. The Boston Diamond is handy for the pocket, and has some excellent original illustrations by Eytinge; Peterson's cheap editions having the advantage of large type; Hurd & Houghton's Household, is the old one, well-kuown, while the Globe is very cheap, with large, readable type, and the Riverside (beginning with "Oliver Twist") is peculiarly valuable for its union of the English and American illustrations. It is a wonderful tribute to the genuis of Dickens that a new generation of readers buy these new editions with an avidity equal to that of their seniors years ago. The early books are usually first produced in these republications and the different houses engaged in the rivalry are making money. The prices are graduated to suit all conditions of the reader's pocket.

RIVAL editions of Thackeray are in the market. Doolady, emulating Ticknor & Fields, has published a neat Diamond copy of "Pendennis"—a neat sqnare volume, printed on small type, and sold for a dollar aud a half—intending to follow with monthly republications of all the works of Thackeray. Harper & Brothers step in with a larger and still cheaper and better edition of the same book, printed on type two sizes larger than Doolady's, and handsomely bound. Thackeray's readers now have their choice of three editions—Harper's octavo and duodecimo, and Doolady's pocket copy.

THE New York Sunday News (Mr. Benjamin Wood's paper) announces that Charles Dickens is to write a new story for that paper, and publishes a fac-simile of part of the novelist's last letter to them ou the subject, thus:

GAD'S HILL PLACE, HINGHAMBY, ROCHESEER. KENT.
Tuesday, April 9, 1897.

DEAR SIR:—I have the pleasure of acknowledging the receipt of your letter dated the sixteenth of last month. I pledge myself, in pursuance of my memorandum of agreement already given, to write the story referred in that letter and in yours. The manuscript to be ready for you by the first of August at latest, and to become yonrs on the conditions mentioned in my communication.

I hope it will be ready for presentation to Brown, Shipley and Co., by the first of July.

Faithfully yours,
CHARLES DICKENS.

The HON. BENJ. WOOD, New York.

W. D. HOWELLS is said to be the principal "reviewer" of the Atlantic Monthly." The recent articles on "Harper's Hand-Book of Travel" and "Alger's Solitude" are from his pen. A correspondent of the Springfield Republican says: "Yet reckless as Mr. Howells is in the use of his critical weapons, few writers are so sensitive to censure as he, and he may count himself fortunate in that he occupies the position of judge rather than that of judged. He is a very laborious writer (his labor, however, being bestowed with the happiest results, for there are few who excel him in light, graceful, and insouciant, yet correct, rhetoric), writing on little bits of paper, a paragraph at a time, and putting them together, as one constructs a geographrcal puzzle."

PROF. NOAH PORTER, of Yalè College, closes a criticism on "Ecce Deus" in the Yale Courant with these words: "It is sufficient for us to know that both 'Ecce Homo' and 'Ecce Deus' are in their place, most eloquent and ablc defences of Christianity, and valuable contributions to Christian literature."

MR. MILL'S LAST VOLUME.—The third volume of Mr. John Stuart Mill's "Dissertations and Discussions" contains two papers of great interest to our countrymen—one on "The Contest in American," first published in "Frazer's Magazine" for February, 1862; the other entitled, "A Few Words on Non-Intervention," published in the same periodical at a latter period. The volume is also enriched by a notable article on Grotc's Plato. which originally appeared in the Edinburgh Review for April, 1866. In regard to these admirable essays, one of Mr. Mill's critics says that all, on their first publication, produced a deep effect on the intellect of England, while one or two had an immediate and powerful influence in disecting the political opinions of the nation.

JEAN INGELOW's new book, "My Choseu Friends," will be republished as soon as completed. She has again postponed her new volume of poems until the autumn. It has been ready for press for two years, but her fear lest it should cause disappointmeut withholds it from publication. She is devoting a great deal of her time to its revision.

MRS. MARY SOMERVILLE has nearly ready a work "Ou Molecular and Microscopic Science."

THE OLD COMEDIES.

AT the present time, when the public of San Francisco, satiated with trashy spectacle and muscular development on the stage, are crowding the Opera House to witness the performance of Edwin Adams, supported by the best stock company ever formed in this city, a few extracts from an article entitled "Plays and Players," which appears in All The Year Round may prove acceptable. The writer comparing the plays of the present day with those of the old school, says:

"As to plays, looking back, how infinitely superior were the pieces of older days! We have only to turn over Garrick's correspondence to see the pains with which every drama was 'blocked out,' considered by many wise heads, altered and shaped, and above all, how long a play took to write. A more curious feature was the part the manager, who had vast experience, took in the composition and alteration. They were not 'knocked off' as now; the play was written to be read. This was a part of the author's profits, which often brought in an additional hundred pounds to his share. But if these modern pieces, which depends so much on realistic effects, as the fire-engine, aod real horses, and real houscs, etc., be sold in book shape, or exhibited on paper, there would be little left to print.

If we turn over Bell's British Theatre, we shall be astonished at the storehonse it is of humors and characters. The comedies of the last century were great and important works, full of variety, full of buoyancy, life and vigor. Nothing need be said of the immortal Good-natured Man and She Stoops to Conquer, treasuries of wit and humor; but there are others scarcely known, save to students of that period of literature, that run those masterpieces very closely. Doctor Hoadley, a clergyman, wrote a comedy called the Suspicious Husband, which, for gaiety, bustle and liveliness of speech, is delightful. Garrick's Ranger the leading character, was long talked of by play-goers. Arthur Murphy's plays are all excellent. The Way to Keep Him, All in the Wrong, The Citizen and the Upholsterer, are broadly humorous, bold and carefully finished; full of life, with every character standing out. This, indeed, explains the secret of the line of good actors who then flonrished. They were given parts which bore study and pondering over, and which had stuff in them, and were, in fact, "characters." What a company of degage writers! The gay but too free-and-easy Mrs. Centlivre, the jovial General Burgoyne, aud the boisterous trio of Hibernians, Bickerstaff, O'Keefe, and Kane O'Hara, author."

After some remarks on the superiority of the burlesque of Midas, to the very best of those of modern days, he continues:

"Thomas Morton caught the morbid German tone of his day and discovered dramatic murders done thirty years ago by finding bloody clothes and daggers in old trunks, still such absurdities are redeemed by varied character, humor and gaiety. Speed the Plough, with Sir Abel and Bob Handy, and never dying Mrs. Grundy, and the cheerful country dance, are a most welcome night's entertainment, even in indifferent hands. Who has not roared over The Cure for the Heartache, with the two Rapids and the Nabob? Or over the no less excellent Heir-at-Law and Doctor Pangloss? Think of the Jealous Wife and Mr. and Mrs. Oakley. What firm clear color—like Hogarth's or Leslie's—what good solid character, near which our modern figures seem all thin lath and plaster! Add the Rivals and the admirable Brinsley Sheridan, and his School for Scandal. But the series is endless. Then, were there comedies to act, players to act them, and audiences to relish both. What have we now to look to?"

It would have done the writer's heart good, had he been present at the Opera House the other night, and observed how thoroughly the old comedy of Wild Oats was enjoyed by the audience. He would have conferred that here was an audience to enjoy a sterling play and no less would he have been forced to confess that the company was capable of doing it justice. The facts are most creditable to San Francisco and should be known by the rest of the world. The fact is that San Francisco will, when the population of California increases, support the standard drama more liberally than any other city in the world. Nothing has been made out of the spectacular pieces which have been produced of late. The Black Crook brought the management at both of the houses where it was produced, in debt. The great successes have been in the eugagements of Mr. aud Mrs. Kean aud Edwin Forrest. The season of tragedy and comedy now commencing with the far from sensational Edwin Adams, promises to be equally successful.

A RACE FOR LIFE.

AN INCIDENT OF THE GREAT REBELLION.

"NINE o'clock and no orders yet!" I exclaimed as I looked at the clock in the waiting-room at the shore headquarters of the commodore commanding the United States gunboats engaged in bombarding a very strong rebel position on the Mississippi river.

Then I turned again to the window to have another glance at my horse, who, looking as if he knew that he was about to engage in some important expidition, was champing his bit, and every now and then rearing up and indulging in a variety of equine amusements, much to the delight and amusement of the man-o'-war's-man who was leading him up and down in front of the building. From what I had heard drop at the mess table that evening I knew it was very important that the general commading the land forces thirty miles away should have an answer to the message which I had conveyed the previous evening by twelve o'clock that night, so I began to think that I should have no very easy task to perform if expected to ride so great a distance in so short a time through the dark woods and along the muddy roads. I had been waiting a half an hour alone, not contemplating the trip with feelings of very lively satisfaction, and wondering if I should ever manage to perform it, until at last I had become quite restless and was anxious to be off.

Another fifteen minutes passed away and my anxiety increased, when the door opened and an officer hurrying into the room placed a dispatch in my hand. "You have not a moment to lose, sir, as you will see if you look at the back of the envelope." I read, 9.15 P. M—. The bearer will ride at at full speed." Placing it carefully in my pocket I was leaving the room when the officer stopped me by saying, "Lest you should be captured, or in the event of your losing the dispatch it may be as well to tell you its contents. The gunboats will make an attempt to run the enemy's batteries as soon after twelve as possible. There are any quantity of guerrillas on the road, and you may be shot; then, of course you are not to blame; but should they by any means get the dispatch without you, why, then you can tell General P—— what is in it. Good night, sergeant, a swift journey, and a safe one to you." "Now," I thought, as I sprang on my horse—"now is the time to try your mettle, Punch— thirty miles, my boy, in three hours, with a prospect of being shot on the way." But I did not think the road a very dangerous one to travel, for up to this time I had never had a chance of facing any of the "Butternuts"—as we used to term the Confederate soldiers—in the field, and I had before me the prospect of winning the general's favor if I was only successful that night. "So here goes for death or glory," I thought; and and in a hard canter I did the first mile of the route, leaving behind me our picket, and getting into a low, marshy, but open country, with every now and then a farm house lying on either side of the road. Sometimes, as the inmates heard the tramping of my horse plashing through the mud, a window would be thrown open and a head popped out. Then again, I'd puss a farmer hanging around his outbuildings, looking with suspicion, and evidently having no kindly feeling towards me.

The night wind blew chill, the pace was good, and the excitement was something rather pleasant to feel for one who for weeks had done nothing but listen to the booming of the guns of the fleet. So at least I got weary of taking any precautions against a class of men whom I thoroughly despised and grew the more careless as a thick black line ahead told me I was nearing the woods. Once there I should be safe from the cowardly dogs, and only run the risk of being captured by the rebel cavalry. Just on the borders of the timber there was a light, too high up for a picket fire. It was another house, perhaps the headquaters of some of the "Butternuts" out on a scouting expedition. No matter what it is, it must be passed. So I swung my little horse on the green sward by the roadside that the sound of my coming should not be heard until I was close to the building. The precaution was an idle one if there was any watchful opponents in my front, for their practical ear would detect the long, heavy tread of my gallant little steed. If they were only thick-headed Missouri farmers, why, perhaps they would not hear me. "Seen, by Jove!" I muttered half aloud, and plunged the spurs into my horse's flank, who bounded away at a racing speed. A window banged down, and as I flew past the spot the door opened, and a man with a rifle in his hand, which I could distinctly see by the candle held by a woman standing behind him, rushed into the front. Then came the click of the weapon and a second after a bullet whizzed over my head. For a moment my blood was up, and I'd have given anything to have ridden up to him revolver in hand and squared accounts, but I had gained the cover of the timber, and I knew that my errand was more important than revenge. So slacking my pace again, I continued on my dreary way.

I lay close to my saddle until I knew that I had left him far in the rear, for there was no more to fear from these people than from a dozen of the enemy's cavalry. A shot in the dark, and all is over; but let the worst come to the worst with the rebels, if you could not fight them or get out of their way, why, they would take care of you and treat you tolerably as a prisoner. Jeff. Thompson was a bold dare-devil guerrilla, but neither he nor any of his men would ill-use a captive. On the other hand, we had abundant evidence of the treachery and cowardice of these sneaking, slaveholding farmers of south-eastern Missouri. When our army advanced, a telegraphic wire was laid connecting the headquarters of our corps with those of Cairo. Hardly a night passed away but it was found cut. Mounted guards patroled the whole route, and yet were unable to prevent the mischief. A cavalryman passing a certain spot would return in half an hour to find the wire cut or some posts pulled down. The general at last, determined to stop this maneuver, issued a short dispatch stating that "in case the telegraph was damaged, the nearest resident to the place where such damage was done would be taken and hung without trial." The cavalry were recalled from their duty as guards, and never after this order was issued had we the slightest cause to complain of our communication being injured. Knowing the antecedents of these gentry, I was naturally very suspicious of them, and as mile after mile was got over, house after house passed, I began to wish that I was in the timber and away from this kind of danger.

It was dark now; the great trees on either side of the road casting their shadows on my path rendered everything black, so that I could not see far before me. I had to trust entirely to my horse, who still kept up the same steady pace, though every now and then he dashed into some muddy water hole or sank deep into the slush which lay on the road. Only five miles more, and we shall be at the station midway between Cairo and our lines. A regiment of our fellows was there, and if I could arrive at that post I felt comparatively safe for the remainder of the journey. Hit, by Jove! No, it is only a flake of mud in my face; but hark! there is a noise in front.

"Now for it, Punch!" and away we go again, and I take the precaution to have my revolver ready for instant use. There is a little sparkling something by the roadside away ahead; my horse shies and springs to the opposite side; click, and I see a long bright barrel. Down goes my pistol, and almost at the same instant two shots are heard, ringing and echoing again and again through the tall trees. A rifle ball has just stuck my saber, but never mind that, for as I look round I hear my enemy's gun drop to the ground, and a cry, as of pain, tells me that my aim was the best. So I pull up again, and as I do so, Punch gives a snort of delight, as much as to say, "You and I have done it this time;" and then another long stretch of ground is covered. "But, softly, boy, softly; the beggars are about again; reserve yourself for the rush; there is more than one, my lad, and you know that I have to depend on you as much as myself." Softly it was; but still we were getting nearer and nearer, and I heard the word of command—

"Shoulder arms! steady, men! let them once come right up;" and presently came the challenge: "Who goes there?"

"Friend."

"Advance, friend, and give the countersign."

"Fort Henry!"

"Right, Harry, right!" a cheery voice exclaimed, which instantly I recognized as that of Bob Downs, of an Indiana regiment.

"Old Clifford told us to keep a sharp look-out for you, and when we heard somebody popping away I feared that they had popped you. Our lines are only a mile away; you'll be safe there, but the heathens are swarming on the other side." Very nice information for one who had been flattering himself that the worst was past. But here are our pickets; they know I am coming: so a hasty challenge and I have passed them. Now I see the white tents of the infantry, and in a moment I am off my horse and at headquarters. The colonel is up, and brings me some brandy neat, whilst my horse stands panting as one orderly rubs his legs and another operates on his body

"Another horse, sergeant?" says the colonel. "No, for I know the one I am riding; he has ever been faithful, and will remain so as long as there is life in him." So they give him some gruel and I start once more. It is 10:40 P. M.—fifteen miles in an hour and twenty-five minutes, including stoppage.

"Take care," says the colonel when I am mounted, "Jeff's men are about, and as near as I can guess six or seven miles away, and the devils will wing you if they can."

But I hardly stay to hear his last remark as I canter off again, slowly passing the thin line of tents, and then through the streets of the little town, awakening the people from their first sleep, by the clatter of my horse's hoofs and the jingling of my saber. A sentry challenges me. "All right," a kind "good night," and once I am out in the darkness. There are the advance pickets; and the officer halts me, and tells me that three or four times he has heard horses about, but for the last half hour as has been still, so he presumes that the rascals have left the main road, and made for the farming districts in search of any of our foraging parties they may pick up. A road through the woods runs parallel with mine for several miles, and at a distance of only half a mile apart. It led right away to the farms, and along this probably the rebels had one. If such was the case, I knew that from the speed I was riding, I should have to pass them; so I again took the turf by the roadside lest they should hear me. Two or three times I thought I'd have a smoke, but then their quick sight might detect the light. So I put it off until I got into camp.

Nobly did the little horse keep on; dig, dig, went his soft feet in the soft turf—on we swept by the tall trees, darkness of the night. Hark! there is something on my right—bah! it is but a rabbit, or some animal frightened at my approach.

But what is that sound in the woods? It is the murmur of voices, and they are getting nearer and nearer with every step I take, and now I know from the peculiar rumble which soldiers can soon detect, that there are cavalry about, and on my right. "They must be in the old road" I thought. "Steady, Punch! steady! They are away ahead. On the turf boy" "Easy! we shall pass them all right yet? Steady," for the little fellow pulled hard on the bit as if every moment was of consequence. Nearer comes the sound; we are almost up with it, and shall be past in a minute. "No! by jingo, they have heard me." I hear their horses in the bush coming right from the road; the leaves crackle beneath their tread.

"Now for it, my lad, as swift as chain-lightning, or we are lost."

On we go; the pace is tremendous, but still I cannot pass them. They know every inch of ground, and are taking a short cut to head me off.

"On, Punch, on," and then the spurs go to work, and the faithful creature does his best. They are close on me. Thank God I am even with them, and if pace is to win the day, why, tired and weary though you are, my boy, I don't much fear the result. "Halt!" cries an angry voice. "If you catch me," I reply; and then I lie low on my saddle, just in time to escape half a dozen balls that fly over my head, but as I lean my hand over my horse's shoulder, I feel something wet oozing out. It is blood! "They have hit you, my good fellow; poor Punch!" but Punch only gives an angry snort and dashes on like the whirlwind. Rattle and clatter, shouts and yells, I hear behind, and I know that the whole party are in pursuit. Bang! goes a carbine, and the bullet strikes a tree. "You can't do much damage, my friend," I cry, "unless you pull up, and then where shall I be?"

Another shot, and I laugh with wild delight, for I know that it has gone buzzing through the timber away at my right. "Try it again," I shout, standing up in my stirrups, and taunting them with being such bad marksmen; for in the excitement I was quite careless of life, and felt inclined to dare the whole party.

My taunts were responded to by a volley, which swept harmlessly over me. A hundred yards only separated me from the "Rebs," but I had the advantage of the night, and if I only could keep up the speed I felt safe, but not wishing to encounter such another ebullition of Confederate wrath, I laid low, and did not look around until another mile was passed Then I took a peep, and saw to my horror, close behind, an officer, (I could distinguish his rank by the bright lace around his cap) mounted on a large horse, every stride gaining on me.

"Halt!" he screamed, "or I'll fire." "Fire away—two can play at that little game;" and suiting the action to the word, I pointed the revolver right at his horse's chest, and let fly. Down went horse and rider, his pistol going off as he fell. Bang! bang! went their carbines again, and on, on, I flew, my steed now showing signs of distress, and requiring the spur to keep him up to the mark. There is an open space ahead—perhaps they will shoot me there. No, I'm past the clearing. Right once more! Three miles more, my lad, and then our pickets—and if they do their duty, as you have done yours, Punch, there will be many a saddle emptied in our rear.

Another look, Hurrah! I'm gaining on them; but still on they come. There is a splash, and then a heavy thud—one of them has fallen in the mud-hole we have just passed. Here's the opening again, I know this part well; and across the corner and away we go over the grass. A laugh behind.

"We've got him now!" What, could I be wrong? No, but a few yards ahead is a great yawning chasm. Baffled! Stuff! "To the bottom, or over." Not an inch swayed the little nag to the right or left, but straight at it, and with a long bound we were across. A hideous yell bust out, and I turned once more in my saddle, and see my pursuers hesitating on the brink. One, two, three are over; the rest ride round. Now comes the rush. They know the pickets are near. By Heavens! they are gaining! my horse is done! not a bit faster will spur or voice urge him.

But surely our boys will hear the shouts, and they then will settle with these gentry for me. Yes, they have heard, and I see an opening in the woods, and a bright barrel, which is instantly withdrawn, is flashing in the starlight between the trees. Saved, but yet no challenge. Perhaps it is another rebel, but it is too near camp for that. I gallop by and see a party of our fellows. An officer holds up his sword, and I whisper softly as I pass, "The hounds are close behind." "Then I will make sauer kraut of them," answers the German officer in command.

A minute more, and then the sharp word, "Aim, fire!" Then a shout and a yell, and tramp of horses' feet, and I know that our lads are upon them, and that many a "Butternut" has gone to his last account.

So I pull my rein, but dare not walk my horse, lest he should drop. Here is our second picket line! In front, upon yonder slope, I can just see the camp-fires. There on my right I hear the heavy tramp of a cavalry sentinel pacing up and down in front of a large farm-house, lighted with candles in nearly every room. I make right for it. The guards hail me. An officer comes to the door. It is the General himself. "The dispatch!" I alight and give it to him, and as I do reel against the door and looking round, see Punch lying on his side, panting for breath. Then comes a heavy boom through the midnight air. "What means that firing?" "That the gunboats are running the blockade, General." Then he looks at the dispatch again, and reads in the presence of several of his staff, "9:16 P. M.," and then pulls out his watch and says very coolly, "12:30; thirty miles in three hours and fifteen minutes!" Well done, my man, I shall not forget you." And he kept his word, for the next day he sent me on a more dangerous mission than the one I had just performed.

THE FENIAN RISE IN DUBLIN ON THE FIFTH OF MARCH, 1867.

I HAD been absent from Dublin on leave, during the whole month of February. When I left the city, on the 27th of February, the Fenian conspiracy would have seemed to an ordinary observer utterly collapsed. Arrests were occasionally made, but were chiefly confined to Americanised Celts. If these men had been born in Ireland, the soil and climate of America had a strange effect upon their constitution. They were tall, pale-faced, and bearded—in every respect presenting the appearance of the genuine article. My duty brought me into contact with many of these prisoners, and I found that for one who came from New York, three came from Massachusetts. They seemed to me to court arrest, for they were singularly rude and insolent, swaggering through the streets, jostling the passers-by, and walking at a rapid pace three or four abreast when the footpath was crowded during the fashionable hours for promenading or shopping. I remarked that several wore large stars of silver on their left breasts: ugly ornaments enough; for they were, in all respects, like pieces of block tin. All had hats, a compound between the "pot hat" and the "Jerry." All, too, had loose overcoats of different shades of grey.

When many were seen together, it became plain that their dress was a kind of uniform. Nothing was found upon these men when searched. Documents they would not carry; revolvers and ammunition were thrown into the river before the police could seize them at the quays. On the American Celts money was found in abundance; the street-rowdies of Dublin and the importations from the slums of manufacturing towns in England seldom had a shilling. The latter were miserable, stunted, woebegone creatures, with a mischievous cast of countenance not usual with the Americans. Now and then the police discovered pikes, swords, belts, revolvers, and rifles—never many together—hidden behind shutters, between beds and mattresses, or under the flooring. Secret information had led the detectives to their hiding-places, and it was surmised by many that the information was given by the leaders of the plot themselves. They knew that every seizure would be magnified tenfold, and made notorious through the public press. Thus the discontented and seditious would believe that the conspirators were at work, and preparing for a rise. The majority, however, believed that Fenianism was merely a gigantic swindle, intended to procure money for the leaders. Such was the state of things when I left Dublin, and it did seem strange to me that, if danger was really imminent, "leave" should have been freely given. There were Fenians, as I afterwards found, in my neighborhood, and accident taught me that the maid-servant in my lodgings was enlisted in the plot. A secluded glen some distance from my home was a favorite haunt of mine, but I found that whenever I strolled out in that direction, she placed a candle in an upper room, the window of which could be seen from the glen. I noticed the light, but did not discover that it was a signal until informed by the constabulary on the night before I left.

I was sitting at breakfast on the morning of the 5th of March, when a jaunting-car was driven up before my window, and a boy handed me a telegram. It was very brief, containing an order for my instant return to Dublin and my post. I felt that "something was up," and, telling the carman to wait, made my hurried preparations. While I was wrapping a rug about my legs, the servant-girl, looking piercingly at me, inquired: "Have they kept their word?" As I hesitated, not knowing what answer to give, she inquired again: "Are the boys up in Dublin? They said they would rise to-day." "Indeed?" said I. "You know much more than I do." As I dashed down the road leading to the station, I noticed that a loose pile of straw at the head of the glen had been fired, and now sent up into the clear air a rolling column of white smoke. In ten minutes similar smoke signals were seen on seven hillocks stretching round and past the glen, and then I believed that there really was "something up."

I traveled to town by the Great Southern and Western Railway in a third-class carriage. I wished to hear the talk of the country people. I counted nine young athletic fellows in the carriage; they were all singularly silent. We took in few additional passengers until the train reached successively Straffan, Celbridge, Lucan, and Cloudalkin. At the last two places passengers became so numerous that accomodation could not be provided for them. There was evidently an understanding between many of the young peasants and two American Celts who got in at Celbridge. The moment these men entered, every pipe was put out. They had with them a stout deal box about twenty inches long and sixteen deep, braced at the corners with iron, and evidently of great weight.

There was no confusion or crowding at the terminus. I noticed that three men stepped out from among the carriages and cabs, and adressed a very brief sentence to the two Americans who had traveled with us. The young men regularly "fell in" and marched rather than walked down the quays. Suddenly they broke up in twos and threes, and disappeared rapidly up the lanes leading to Thomas and James street. Three hours afterwards, I recognised five of them at Tallaght.

Coming down the north side of the quays, here and there scarcely seen—for the gas was peculiary dim—I saw policemen wearing swords standing in six together with their backs against shop shutters. They looked like a black wall. Further on, a group of boys, youths, and men would be formed around one person in the centre, and, after receiving brief directions from him, also broke up into twos and threes and passed rapidly down the quay.

I saw one group in process of formation. A man stood motionless in the centre of the pathway, near Arran Quay Chapel. He beat the pavement with his iron-shod heel, as if to warm his feet. Almost immediately, were heard at a distance similar triple beatings of the feet, and in an incredibly short time a group of at least thirty formed in a circle, with their faces turned towards an individual in the centre—to break up in twos or threes almost as soon as formed. I counted thirty-one of these groups from the railway terminus to Sackville street. But here there was a continuous stream of men and boys passing rapidly over Carlisle Bridge. For the most part they were the gamins of the city—horse-holders, sweepers of shop doors, ragged nondescripts, pickpockets. Palefaced, slouching men, smelling strongly of whisky and tobacco, appeared among the ruck. Now and then an American Celt could be seen to hail a cab, into which three and sometimes five persons would enter. The faces were all turned one way, and the town seemed to be disgorging all its rabble. I could compare the stampede to nothing but the rush of people to witness a fire. Not a word was spoken, and though very large numbers poured out of Dublin together, there was not the slightest disturbance or confusion. I followed the moving stream up Westmoreland street, past the college in whose vast front not a light was to be seen, through Grafton street, up Stephen's-green, and Harcourt street. There I left them, and hurried home. I expected to find explicit orders awaiting me.

Along the route taken by the multitude, the cigar-shops, oyster-stalls, and gin-palaces were open as usual. In my own street every house was lighted up, and a large ball was being given in Harcourt street. No chain was placed across my own hall door, and my servant, in answer to my inquiries, replied, as coolly as if it were a matter of no importance, than "the Fenians had riz." In the parlor all were at "high tea." A blazing fire shone out gloriously, and a joyful welcome was given me. Short space was there for rest or warmth. A long envelope was handed to me, and in five minutes I left my home alone, to move with the Fenians up to a certain point. They had risen, and it was believed that they intended, when collected in numbers sufficiently great, to pour down upon the wealthiest portion of the city, and plunder there.

I found that the greater portion of the mass began to move slowly in the neighborhood of Rathmines; a suburb consisting mainly of a single street of fine houses inhabited by the higher orders of the middle class. This street is three quarters of a mile long, with a very wide footpath on either side. At the extremity furthest from the city, it opens out into a spacious triangular place, at the two opposite angles of which two roads branch out: one leading to Rathgar, Roundtown, and Rathfarnham: the other, though an irregular line of buildings, to Palmerston-fields, which are skirted by the river Dodder, here exceedingly picturesque. There are some very fine old trees in the neighborhood; and in a magnificent field surrounded by wood the multitude gathered. I think, however, that from the first many of the Fenians passed on rapidly, crossed a bridge over the Dodder, and made for the rendezvous at Tallaght, a village fully four miles to the right. As far as I could judge, there were at no time more than between six and seven hundred persons assembled at Palmerston-fields, of whom four-fifths were youths not over eighteen years of age, weaklings, and with a dissipated air. There were two carts: both containing arms, as we subsequently found. For some time the mass moved about without any apparent object, and I understood they were waiting for some one to lead them. The Rathmines police-office is close to the triangular space, and from this the little garrison of eight men hovered on the skirts of the Fenians, now and then arresting individuals. Suddenly, and without a word, this mass of Fenians broke up; some proceed at a rapid pace toward Tallaght, but fully half the number, already tired of the enterprise and alarmed by discovering that they were really required to fight, poured back into the city, flinging away the arms they had received. They found that the police were searching all persons passing into Dublin whose appearance was suspicious; consequently, they determined to rid themselves of proofs of complacity with the rising. The night wore on, raw and cold, with a drizzling of sleet and rain. The romantic apprentices shuddered at a four miles' march to Tallaght over an undulating country.

By this time the alarm had spread. Cavalry from Portobello, and infantry from other barracks, were on the rear of those stepping out for Tallaght. The cavalry did not proceed very rapidly; for, I believe, it was designed by the authorities to allow the mass to meet at Tallaght. The metropolitan police, whom I have spoken of as standing in sixes by the shop shutters, had now united into a very formidable body of tall strong men, and they moved after the insurgents as rapidly as the cavalry. They marched silent as death, each man fully able to deal with half a dozen Fenians. Tired and worn out by my long travel, I stepped into a friend's house to obtain some refreshment, but after a little rest I mounted my friend's car, and arrived at Tallaght before the great event of the night occurred.

The lower order of Irish use the phrase, Tallaght-hill "talk," to express boasts and menaces without power to enforce them. From the hill you can look down upon Dublin, "the city of the black pool;" and on a summer's day or moonlight night the panorama is magnificent. St. Patrick's cathedral stands out grandly, with its lofty steeple, and spire, and buttress. A scout placed on Tallaght-hill could ascertain, without difficulty every military movement in Dublin. I do not know the plans of the Fenians, but I think they expected large reinforcements to meet them at Tallaght from the counties of Meath, Wicklow, Wexford, and Kildare, and, when all were combined, to pour down upon that part of Dublin which, from their eyrie, they saw to be least protected. Lord Strathnairn, however, was too quick for them, and while he and his strong force of infantry and cavalry were marching to cut off the approaches to the city, he had directed a portion of the 48th Regiment to move from the Curragh by the Southern and Western Railway, to leave the train at Celbridge station, and cut off the rear of the insurgents.

But, before the military had reached the Fenians, the latter were cowed and beaten.

The police barrack at Tallaght is a weak building, incapable of resisting determined assailants. On the night of the 5th of March there were fourteen constabulary in the barracks, when an excited messenger gave information that the Fenians had risen and were marching on the Tallaght road. Almost at the same moment the sound of a very large number of advancing men was heard. The inspector who commanded the constabulary ordered his men to move out and face the enemy. These could be heard and seen advancing like an irregular moving wall. It seemed as if the earth had risen five or six feet high, and were pressing forward. When the constabulary challenged the crowd, no reply was given. Some order was issued to the insurgents, and then a volley came from the rebel ranks, irregular and scattered. The constabulary had knelt down, and the insurgents, fire passed over them without wounding a man. But the light of the rifles pointed out the insurgents to the constabulary, who delivered their fire, all together, like one shot. There was silence for an instant, then terrific yells rent the air, and screams of men in agony. The insurgents recoiled and broke at once. I can compare their break up to nothing but that of a "school" of mackerel. They ran everywhere, jostling, impeding, fighting each other, in anxiety to escape. You could hear the pike-staves and revolvers falling on the ground, as they were thrown away in the panic.

The dark mass melted away, on the ground lay two dying men: one clutching at the gravel and screaming, "O men! O men!" The other was desperately wounded, and insensible. Two others were found next morning. The bullets of the constabulary did their work well; no one can tell how many were "hurt badly" by that one volley. I know there have been several clandestine burials and unhonored graves; and I believe that there are still many sorely mangled in outhouses, a terror to their friends.

During the remainder of the night, or rather in the dark morning, the insurgents, who had fled to Tallaght-hill, slipped off by ditches, hedge rows, and mountain-torrent beds. When light dawned, there were not more than three hundred men and boys together, the most timid of the lot, who had feared even to attempt escape. The military captured with ease one hundred and eighty-six of these miserable wretches, half dead with fear, and utterly worn out with hunger and fatigue. They were marched into Dublin, and "paraded" in the Castle yard. Some begged for water, others for a morsel of bread; many threw themselves down on the flags to get a moment's rest. A more dismal and disgusting spectacle was never seen. There my duty ended.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

THERE is something peculiarly interesting in the present position and attitude of parties in this State, and judging from such manifestations of public opinion as have thus far been made, and may be taken to be reliable, the approaching struggle between the Republicans and their opponents gives promise of proving one of the most closely and sharply contested ones in the history of California. So far as the platforms put forth by the conventions of the two parties are concerned, it is difficult for an unbiased observer to avoid the conclusion that there are certain politic evasions and reservations in both. The Republicans have refrained from embodying in the "resolutions" upon which they propose to go into the campaign, certain doctrines in regard to suffrage, reconstruction, etc., which there is ample reason to believe are conscientiously held, not only by their principal leaders, but by the great majority of the party, and which they could only have been restrained from distinctly avowing by considerations of policy. The Democrats on the other hand, profess a cheerful acceptance of the result of the appeal to arms, as a "practical settlement of the issues involved," which no intelligent reader of their principal organs can easily persuade himself is shared in perfect good faith by the majority of the party. Undoubtedly both parties, have in framing their platforms made some concession to expediency with reference to immediate results. Such concessions are perhaps unavoidable in practical politics, however much they may be deprecated by men of unswerving loyalty to ideas and principles. At any rate, they have always been made by political parties in the United States, on the eve of popular elections. Aside from the issue joined in regard to the Congressional policy of reconstruction, and some points of minor importance, it may be maintained with a decent show of plausibility that the two parties occupy substantially the same ground upon questions of national politics. The first of the resolutions adopted by the Democratic Convention, that "the Government of the United States is the paramount Government of the country," and that the allegiance due from the citizen to such Government is a binding and perpetual obligation to be observed with fidelity and good faith, would seem to involve a frank abandonment of the doctrines of States right, and of an allegiance due to the State paramount to that due to the Federal Government. The second resolution, to the effect that all the questions involved in the late rebellion have been settled by the result of the war, and that "it is the duty of all to acquiesce in this settlement," must be construed as a surrender of all the pretensions urged on the behalf of the seceding States by democrats of the Wood and Vallandigham school, during the war. But if this new profession of the Democratic faith is made in sincerity and honesty, it would seem to require in consistency the repudiation of the old anti-war leaders as candidates for office. Those leaders, however, have not, in fact, been repudiated. The policy that dictated the platform has not been carried out in nominations. The Democratic party having clearly shown by the moderate and guarded platform which they have adopted how far they were willing to go, and what concessions they were willing to make, in the interests of expediency and for the purpose of relieving themselves of the odium attaching to the doctrines which for the last five years, and until the cause of the seceding States was proved beyond per-adventure to be a "lost cause," they have advocated; finally gave evidence by some of their nominations of the affection which they still cherish for the men who had been throughout the struggle, the most consistent and bitter enemies of the Government, and the most uncompromising and zealous champions of its assailants, The platform tells one story; the nominations that indicate the personal leanings and preferences of the Convention tell another, and it is but fair, in estimating the sincerity and good faith of the declaration of principles, to take in consideration the antecedents of the individuals who are put forward as the chosen leaders of the party.

It is related of two old Scotch ministers that the one asked the other if he were not sorely tempted at times to go fishing on the Sunday afternoons. "Oh, mon," replied his fellow-laborer, "I'm never tempted lang; I just gang."

THE LOGIC OF THE POCKET-HANDKERCHIEF.

WE have long had a vague impression, derived from such of his writings as have fallen under our observation that Mr. Theodoro Tilton of the N. Y. Independent, belonged to that class of spurious reformers and philanthropists, in whom egotism, vanity, and gushing sentimentality are the predominating qualities. When we read, some time since, his lachrymose lamentations over "the fall" of "his dear friend," Henry Ward Beecher, because the latter took a different view of the subject of reconstruction, from that entertained by some of his friends, we wondered much how it was, that so Tupperish an individual had come to attain so considerable an amount of celebrity, not only as a writer, but as in some sort, a political leader; but it was not until we saw his singular and pitiful article in the Independent, written from Auburn, in which he reviews his little tearful drama, mourning this time, over "the apostacy" of Mr. Seward, that we began to perceive clearly what an essentially small-souled creature this Theodore Tilton, with his absurd assumption, and his dishonest affectation of "pity and sadness" as one of the means of offering vulgar insult, must really be. We are very far from agreeing with Mr. Beecher's opinions on the subject of reconstruction, and we regretted very much several aberrations, as they seemed to us, in Mr. Seward's later career; but think it about time that our American custom of falling to mourning over our public men when tho express views which we have not expected from them, and do not approve, just as though they had become morally degraded, should be characterized and understood as it deserves. When Tilton puts his handkerchief to his eyes, and falls to wailing over Mr. Beecher's or Mr. Seward's "apostacy" from the "cause of freedom," etc., because either of those great men in the use of his own judgment and intellect, arrives at conclusions which Tilton considers false, his lamentation is simply a most offensive and insolent assumption of moral or intellectual superiority. This kind of tactics, by which crocodile tears are substituted for the usual weapons of controversy, has recently become quite characteristic of the Independent, so much so, that on almost every late occasion, where a leader of any note, in the Republican party, has ventured upon an independent expression of views distasteful to the editor, his handkerchief has been brought into requisition.

MRS. CUPPY IN STOCKTON.

DURING Mrs. Cuppy's recent visit at Stockton, she was a positive wonder to the inhabitants of that antiquated burg of a single hack. The Stocktonian conception of a lecturess was, of course, the traditional "tall, angular, bony, spectacled female, clad in outlandish garb, and speaking in graterish tones."

Stockton is at the head of the slough.

The sea of critical faces assembled at Hickman's hall, for facetious comment on the "Free Lecture" saw at length moving through their midst an elegant woman clad in white, unsupported and unattended, who seating herself upon the platform, faced them with a majestic coolness and deliberation. Then primeval Stocktonians felt that somebody was there.

They were quiet, respectful, and forgot that they lived at the head of the slough and had but one hack. Next they listened and heard some very plain truths which many of them had acknowledged to themselves for a long time, but had never dared to acknowledge to each other. They looked at each other timidly, then at the oratoress, then at each other again, and then they not only forgot that Stockton was at the head of the slough and contained but one hack, but they became oblivious of the fact of the existence in their midst of that great attraction the Insane Asylum.

Said one aged Stocktonian to another, the next morning after the lecture on "Woman," while wending their way in search of their matutinal beverage:

"Why, where were all these things said?"

"At Hickman's Hall," said the other Stocktonian who was partly prostrated by the lecture.

Then he looked long and anxious in the direction of the slough to see if it was still there.

"And how did the Stockton people take it?" said the second Stocktonian, as he tottered feebly after his companion:

"Take it!" said the first old man wiping his spectacles and looking around to see if all the churches were still in their usual places. "Why they had to take it!"

Yes, they "had to take it," and from a woman too! and worse than all many of them liked it.

Stockton, it may be added in conclusion, lies in the mud at the head of the slough and is populated by the Insane Asylum. The inhabitants are a simple, inoffensive race and are much attached to their homes, the slough and Insane Asylum. At present they are very much afraid of female speakers. In time the race will be developed into a moderate degree of intelligence.

Blake, the Poet-Artist.—Algernon Charles Swinburne will immediately follow up his "Song of Italy," which has caused some sensation on both sides of the great ocean, by "W. Blake, Poet and Artist; Essays," with colored illustrations.

American Boys.—Probably in every age, since the time of poor Adam and Eve's trouble with their wilful son, the world has been supposed to be near its end on account of the naughtiness of boys. We confess that, for ourselves, in moments of wrath at the impish perversity, or of sorrow at the precocious wickedness of noted specimens of American boyhood, we have sometimes been tempted to that supposition, and certainly we could not much wonder if Young America furnished more food for the Prophet's avenging bears than Young Israel supplied. Yet the world has continued to be, and generation after generation has risen from petticoats, to jackets and trousers, and jackets and trousers to coats and pantaloons, without any utter extinction of the line of masculine succession. That succession will probably be kept up in this hemisphere, and here, as of old, the folly of youth will, in due time, be subdued by the wisdom of age. All the more earnestly, because of our good hope for the ultimate welfare of our country, we are disposed to look carefully and seriously at the tendencies of our sons, desirous at once of discovering their peculiar temptations and advantages.

Our daughters are constitutionally more marked by sensibility, and our sons are more marked by wilfulness. The consequence is, that we are more anxious what will happen to our daughters, and what will happen from our sons—the daughters sensitiveness exposing her to receive harm, and the son's wilfulness exposing him to do harm. We are not wise to quarrel with nature, and we must expect that boys will be more noisy and mischievous than girls; nay, we may count it a good sign of a lad's force of character if there is a good share of aggressive, fun-loving pluck in his composition. Well managed, his animal spirits will give him all the more manly loyalty, and, when true to the right cause, he will be all the more true because so much living sap has gone up into the fruit of his obedience.

Humor.—Humor is not so distinct a quality as, for the purposes of criticism, it is commonly regarded, but is allied to every faculty, even the divinest. The familiar and cheerful conversation around every fireside, when analyzed, will be found to be sweetened by this principle. There is not only a never-failing, pleasant and earnest humor kept up there, embracing the domestic affairs, the dinner and the scolding, but there is also a constant run upon the neighbors, and upon Church and State; and to maintain this, in a great measure, is the dinner provided and the fire kept burning. There will be neighbors—parties to a very genuine and even romantic friendship—whose whole audible salutation and intercourse (abstaining from the usual cordial expressions, grasping of hands and affectionate farewells) consist in the mutual play and interchange of a genial and healthy humor which excepts nothing—not even themselves in its lawless range. The child plays continually if you will let it, and all its life is a sort of practical humor of a very pure kind, often of so fine and ethereal a nature that its parents, its uncles and cousins can in nowise participate in it, but stand aloof in silent admiration and reverence even. The more quiet the more profound it is. Even nature is observed to have her playful moods or aspects, of which man seems sometime to be the sport.

Pen-and-Ink Portrait of Lamartine.—"That old man sitting in a chair, sad and silent, is he. So recently as ten years since, when he walked about the streets of Paris, straight, thin and buoyant, he looked, with his threadbare clothes, like a nobleman on whom fortune had not smiled, and and who shielded himself by extreme cleanliness from the results of poverty. Now age has marked him distinctly; every feature; every sinuosity epedermis bears age's claws. If the head retains the Grecian smallness which was once admired, it is no longer in harmonious proportion with the face. The cheek bones and jaws have increased; the eyes have lost their lustre, and that eloquent mouth, which calmed storms, and pacified angry mobs, has lost some of its teeth, and undergone age's deformity. He speaks with so much difficulty, he commonly keeps silent. It is said Mr. de Lamartine's debts amount to $400,000, and his income is set down at $16,000 a year, of which $6,000 comes from the Sultan (who settled some years since this annuity on him), and $6,000 from his wife's estate. If these statements be true, Mr. de Lamartine requires $24,000 a year to keep down the interest of his debt; and it is said he cannot manage to live for less than $20,000 a year, consequently his income is just $28,000 a year below his expenses. But it must be noticed that his copyright is not included in this estimate of income."

If you have an opportunity to do a generous action, do it It's a very pleasant reflection to go to sleep with.

Louisiana Rotisserie.—The old Louisiana Rotisserie on Dupont street near the corner of Washington, has been re-opened by J. Branger, formally of Kearney street near Jackson. The well-known qualifications of Branger as a caterer to the San Francisco public for years, will resume him liberal patronage. Families living in the Northern portion of the city will find this place a great convenience for dinners, supplied at the Restaurant, or at their homes. Private entrance on Washington street, one door above Dupont. Single gentlemen can procure a breakfast or dinner at the "Rotisserie," such as can be had at no other place.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Dr. William Smith's Dictionary of the Bible.—Revised and Edited by Professor H. B Hackett, D. D., with the co-operation of Mr. Ezra Abbott, A. M., Assistant Librarian of Harvard Universty. New York. Hurd & Houghton. San Francisco, A. Roman & Co.

In undertaking to issue an American edition of this great work in snch a form as to render it generally available, Messrs. Hurd & Houghton have laid not only the theologians of the country, but all persons on this side of the Atlantic who are interested in biblical studies, under very great obligations. Among scholars in this field, the reputation of Dr. Smith's encyclopedic work is so well established as to make comment upon its character quite superfluous. Beyond that comparatively small circle, its peculiar excellence is not so well known. It may be as well, therefore, to state for the information of those who are unacquainted with the work, that in accuracy, completeness, and range of topics, its superiority to any similar Lexicon in the English language is not disputed, It is a work of vast erudition, embodying the fruit of the ripest biblical scolarship of England, and constitnting a library in itself.

The publishers propose to issue the Dictionary in numbers, of which there will be about thirty—a most excellent plan for several reasons. The second number is before us. It is of medium octavo size, aud contains one hundred and thirteen pages in double columns, embracing an alphabetical range from "Antioch" to "Badger-skins." This number is copiously illustrated, wherever the subject admits of elucidation in that way. The Dictionary is published by snbscription, at the moderate price of seveuty-five cents per number, an arrangement which will place it within the reach of thousands who would not be able to afford the expense of the English edition. The publishers have done wisely in resolving to reprint the entire work, without abridgement, and also in incorporating the two appendices in the body of the work. Those appendices embrace over one hundred pages, treating of subjects overlooked or imperfectly handled when reached in regular alphabetical conrse ; by the arrangement adopted in the American edition much is gained for the purpose of ready and conveniemt reference by the student. It is a part of the plan of the publishers to add a number of new articles, on various topics required by Dr. Smith's plan, together with additions to other which seem not fully to represent the present state of knowledge or of critical opinion on the subject discussed. In making these additions and improvements, the editor has had the assistance of a large number of American scholars, eminent in the department of diblical study, among whom are such names as those of Profcssor Woolsey, of Yale] College, Professor Peabody, of Harvard, and Professor Shedd, of Ne 7 York.

In Bonds. A novel, by Laura Preston. A. Roman & Co., Booksellers, Pnblishers and Importers, 417 and 419 Montgomery street, San Francisco ; 17 Mercer stroet, New York, 1867.

This is a very elegantly printed volume of 247 pages. It is not often, that a novelist enjoys the pleasure of seeing his or her literary production laid before the public in a shape so attractive. "Laura Preston," whoever she may be, is certainly to be congratulated upou her rare good fortune in having fouud a publisher sufficiently liberal and venturous, to be willing to bring out a first attempt at fiction, in a style suggesting that said publisher has adopted as his motto á somewhat profane expression indicativo of utter recklessness on the question of expenso. Thc present volume is in all respects a most admirable specimen of the book-making art, in its perfection. The paper is of finer quality, the type is clearer, the margin more ample, and the entire typographical appearance more agreeable, than in any novel that has recently been issued from the American press. Wo trust that the literary part of the work may be found to correspond in excellence with the mechanical part ; but of that, we do not think it fair to speak without a more careful examination than we have yet found time to bestow upon the book. As a Californian book, and a first attempt, it is entitled to more considerate treatment than we are in the habit of according to new novels of average merit. We will therefore refrain from saying more at present, than that the story seems to be highly romantic in its outline and slightly sensational in its incideuts ; that several of its characters, as Claude Leveredge, for instance, strike us as being rather overstrained ; that the dialogue is frequently too prolix, aud that the conduct attributed to the heroine, "La Gueriba," in certain critical situations, especially in voluntarily becoming a slave as an act of expiation, appears to us to be quite beyond the bounds of that kind of probability to which it is the business of the artistic writer of fiction to adhere. As if conscious of some liability to criticism in this respect, the author makes an appeal to the incredulous in three lines of Shakspeare, placed on the title page by way of a motto :

> "With caution judge of probability:
> Things thought unlikely, e'en impossible,
> Experience often shows us to be true."

But this admonition, thongh just enough when understood as referring to actual occurrences, has no application to works of art, for obvious reasons, which we shall not at present undertake to unfold. The writer of the modern novel of society, can least of all, venture to invoke such a principle as a justification for representing his characters as doing things that in actual life would be incredible without positive and overwhelming proof. As yet, however, we have done no more than "skim over." In Bonds, reading a few pages here and there, and gathering but a vague idea of the thread of the story, so that it is possible that adequate motives for what appears to us to be utterly improbable conduct on the part of several of the principal characters, may be developed when the missing links are supplied.

Farragut and Our Naval Commanders. By Hon. J. T. Headley, author of "Washington and his Generals," "Napoleon and his Marshals," "Sacred Mountains," etc. A companion volume to Headley's "Grant and Sherman," comprising the early life and public services of the prominent Naval Commander, who, with Grant and Sherman and their Generals, brought to a triumphant close the Great Rebellion of 1861—1865, with numerous fine steel portraits and battle scenes. Sold only by subscription. New York: E. B. Treat & Co., Publishers, 1867. E. E. Shear, No. 8 Montgomery street, General Agent for the Pacific coast.

This is a large and handsome volume, illustrated with a number of steel portraits, and a large sprinkling of battle pieces," It comprises the early life, public services and naval career of Admiral Farragut, Vice Admiral Porter, Admirals Foote, Dupont, Stringham, Davis, Goldsborough and Dahlgreen ; Commodores Walker, Winslow, Werden, Bailly, and a great number of our naval celebrities. The narrative is the work of John T. Headley, and exhibits all the characteristic merits and blandishes of his peculiar style. It is graphic, spirited, and always readable, though often somewhat diffuse, with occasionally a little too much of common-place reflection, conpled with recent passages, indicating that Mr. Headley has never quite conquered his old predilictiou for fine writing.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

To write about dramatic affairs this week is a far more comfortable task than it has been for many months past. I have long hoped for some time past to be able to announce that the theatres were "on their last legs," and now, thank the gods, the legs have gone and the brain of our intelligent public is once more appealed to. Muscle has had its reign, and now the mind is to have a little wholesome exercise and amusement. A season of comedy and tragedy commenced at Maguire's Opera Honse, on Wednesday evening, when Mr. Edwin Adams, the yonng American tragedian, who promises to become better entitled to the name of "The Great American Tragedian," than the veteran who now bears it, made his first appearance as "Hamlet."

The Opera House was crowded on Monday last, by the beauty, brains and fashion of San Francisco. Mr. Adams met with a most enthusiastic reception. He has a good stage presence and is graceful in his movements. During the first scene he was evidently a little nervous, but in the ghost scene, quite recovered himself and played splendidly. He was very good in the scene with "Ophelia," where she returns his presents, and especially so in the play scene. His acting throughout was so even after the first act, on the first night, that it is hard to particularize. After the "Hamlets" which have been inflicted on the public, "Hamlets" who appeared to consider that the great object to be attained was to play the part unlike every one without regard to how much they sacrificed the sense of Shakspeare, Mr. Adams' conscientions rendition of this character, is most refreshing. He makes his original points in a quiet, nnobtrnsive manner instead of striking a circus attitude, and begging applause. Mr. Adams was well supported. John McCullough read the part of the ghost impressively, and appeared in a magnificent suit of mail. The Alta critic wanted a bit of green gauze over it. As the ghost of Hamlet's father did not appear enveloped in a mosqnito net (there are no mosqnitoes where he came from) we thiuk Mr. McCullough did well in dispensing with it. I am especially glad he did, as the Alta man was thns afforded an opportunity of writing a safe bit of "criticism." Mr. Edwards' "Laertes," was a finished piece of acting, as are all his impersonations. Mrs. Sophie Edwin played the "Queen" finely, and was very good in the scene with "Hamlet," where the "Ghost" appears in the chamber. Everyone knows how good a "Polonius" D. C. Anderson is, and W. Barry's "Grave-digger" is no less famons. Miss Sallie Hinckley deserves great credit for the manuer in which she played "Ophelia." She simulated madness very effectively. The cast was a very good one throughout and the piece was well played. affording all present a rich dramatic treat.

On Tuesday, the old three-act comedy of Wild Oats was produced, and Mr. Adams in "Rover," proved himself a fine comedian as well as a talented tragedian. There was a freshness and vitality about his acting which delighted everyone ; the audience were most liberal in ther applause and could not restrain their laughter for many consecutive minutes. The Opera Honse was a perfect temple of Momus. The support was very good and the play went as smoothly as if it had been played for a hundred nights previonsly. The Company at Magnire's Opera House, can probably study, rehearse and produce a play in a shorter time than any other company in the world. We have no runs of three hundred nights here, new pieces are studied daily, and as practice makes perfect, the Opera House company enjoys great advantages. Its members ought to enjoy it, of course, but I am afraid they are ungrateful for their blessings. On Thursday night, Richard III was produced. I have not seen a better impersonation of "Gloster," than that of Mr. Adams. I consider that in the tent scene his portrayal of the dread and horror which seizes him is incomparably superior to Edwin Forrest's. The latter rushes to the footlights, and, with a horribly distorted countenance plays directly at the audience who incontinently applaud. Mr. Adams, never appears to be conscions of the presence of an audience. In this scene, he falls near the couch from which he springs, with his face turned to the audience, and after his burst of passion does not make the usual appeal for applause. John McCullough's "Richmond," was a capital performance. I cannot say that Mr. J. A. Herne was quite as much at home in the part of "Backingham" as he is in comedy, but he is too good an actor to play any part badly. Mrs. Sophie Edwin's "Queen Elizabeth," was a good piece of acting. Miss Sallie Hinckley though suffering from a severe cold, read and acted the part of "Lady Anne," very well, the hoarseness of her voice marring her reading the less as it might be fancied that it was caused by grief instead of the San Francisco wind. Last night Wild Oats was played to one of the largest audiences ever assembled in the Opera House.

This afternoon, this capital comedy which has made such an immense hit, will be repeated, and in the evening Macbeth will be produced with a strong cast. On this occasion Mrs. Sophie Edwin will make her first appearance in the character of "Lady Macbeth." On Monday, I believe that Falconer's fine comedy of Men of the Day is to be produced. Mr. Adams' repertoire is large, and many plays will be presented during his engagement. He is happy in obtaining such efficient support as is afforded him by the stock company at the Opera Honse whichis, as at present constituted equal to anything that may be committed to it.

The wonderful De Lave male and female gymnasts concluded their engagement at the Academy of Music on Thnrsday evening. The performances of the intrepid little Zoe amazed all who witnessed them.

I must ackuowledge the receipt of an invitation to be present at the second of the series of Occidental Theatricals, at Turn Verein Hall on Thursday evening, June 27th. John Tobin's beautiful play of The Honeymoon will be performed. The first entertainment given by the Occidental Theatricals was a very pleasant affair.

At the Metropolitan Theater, Heller has been conjuring to rather slim houses. On the conclnsion of his engagement Frank Howson, who has leased the theater for three months, assumes the management. He is securing all the talent which is available, and will open with a strong burlesque company.

Mr. and Mrs. Bates, whose line is light comedy and general business, arrived from the East on the Moses Taylor on Monday last, Perhaps they might find an opening at the Metropolitan Theatre when Frank Howson enters into possession of it. We have read much of them in the Eastern papers and San Franciscans are always anxious to see new faces on the stage.

The Anniversary Ball of the Olympic Club—always one of the most fashionable given in San Francisco—will take place at Platt's Hall, on Tuesday evening, June 25th. Tickets may be obtained of the Superintendent, those for ladies may be obtained on written application.

On Wednesday, the Italian Opera Troupe, lately performing at the Academy of Music, went up to Sacramento for a short season. It is said that both Ione and Sapho are to be produced. The former may be played, but considerable preparation is needed to produce the latter. However, if the Sacramento people are to be treated to both these operas before we are, we must not grumble. We are sure to hear them in a week or two if our music-and-money-loving public will ensure the management from positive loss by making up a good subscription list.

The B'nai Berith Literary and Social Circle give their fourth entertainment at Platt's Hall, on Monday, June 24th. The farce of A Conjugal Lesson will be played ; the Misses Laemlin will perform on the piano, and the entertainment will conclude with a ball.

Mrs. Cuppy will lecture on "Trifles" to-morrow evening, at the Mechanics' Institute Hall. Mrs. Cuppy is sure to mix much good hard, solid sense with the trifles of which she treats.

Touchstone.

Gunsmith.—J. C. E. Klepzig, manufacturer of fire arms, makes to order every discription of "shooting irons," and has on hand an assortmeut of Guns, Rifles and Pistols of the most celebrated makers both of Europe and the Eastern States. Those who have not seen the Prussian Needle Gun should call and see this eistcuctive impliment. In connection with his legitimate business is that of gilding and silver plating of all kinds of metals, also silver or plated ware reburnished. His establishment is No. 733 Washington street, south side, first house above the Plaza.

NATURE'S ADORATION.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

The harp at Nature's advent strung
Has never ceased to play;
The song the stars of morning sung
Has never died away.

And prayer is made, and praise is given,
By all things near and far:
The ocean looketh up to heaven,
And mirrors every star.

Its waves are kneeling on the strand,
As kneels the human knee,
Their white locks bowing to the sand,
The priesthood of the sea!

They pour their glittering treasures forth,
Their gifts of pearls they bring,
And all the listening hills of earth
Take up the song they sing.

The green earth sends her incense up
From many a mountain shrine;
From folded leaf and dewy cup
She pours her sacret wine.

The mists above the morning rills
Rise white as wings of prayer;
The alter curtains of the hills
Are sunset's purple air.

The wind with hymns of praise are loud,
Or low with sobs of pain,
Thunder organ of the cloud,
The dropping tears of rain.

With drooping head and branches crossed,
The twilight forest grieves,
Or speaks with tongues of Pentecost
From all its summit leaves.

The blue sky is the temple's arch,
Its transept earth and air,
The music of its starry march
The chorus of a prayer.

So Nature keeps the reverent frame
With which her years began,
And all her signs and voices shame
The prayerless heart of man.

GERMANY CONTRASTED WITH THE UNITED STATES.

GERMAN MORALITY—INTEMPERANCE—OTHER SOCIAL EVILS—GERMANY AND AMERICA CONTRASTED—AN UNPLEASANT PRACTISE—EFFICACY OF GERMAN LAW.

LEIPSIC, APRIL 19, 1867.

I USE the word morality only in its strictly literal sense. I know there are many who are unable or unwilling to separate it from religion, who persist in judging of and criticising the former from the stand point of New England piety, and to such the word morality as applied to Germans would be a contradiction. But I deny the right of judging it from such a stand point. Because we choose to associate the word in our minds with a certain religious belief and make it amendable to certain laws having their origin chiefly in religious societies, we have come to look upon it as associated with religion, having the same origin and affected by like causes. If a man with us is religious, it is taken for granted he is moral; but is not an irreligious moral man an anomoly?" Do we admit that a man having no religious sentiments can be richly endowed with moral ones? We forget that their origin was widely different, the one origiuating in man's instinctive homage and reverence to a superior Being, the other, in his desire to protect himself from the license of his own species, and the discrimination of his mind between right and wrong. We hold men moral not only as they obey the law and keep order, but as they observe the Sabbath and religious ordinances. "Does Mr. A—— bear a good moral character?" "Oh yes, he is a member of —— church." "But Mr. B——." "Oh, I don't know; very likely; I have heard nothing against him, but you know he is not a professor of religion." Viewed from this last stand point, the Germans are a set of reprobates and Sabbath-breakers. From that of morality alone, they are the most sober, orderly, law abiding people whom I have ever seen. I believe one reason for this is the fact that they have (if I may use the term) no ideal platform upon which a few thousand people are perched, loudly urging the majority of the world to "come up there," and assuring them that it is a sovereign remedy for all the ill under which they are suffering. If however, the the crowd below don't choose to follow this advise, do the idealists seek to releive them where they are? No! that is the condition, they must first help themselves.

In the German Christian world all this is changed. They have no idea because a portion of society have been brought to a sense of religious respousibility and live perfect and consistent lives, that they should, in their endeavors to bring the rest of the world to their side, ignore the evil which exists among them and which it is their duty to ameliorate. They don't forget while urging people to lead better lives that a great portion of them are never destined to lead better ones, and it is their duty to correct by practical and sensible means that which they know cannot be cured. But we too often in our striving after ideal perfection, withdraw onrselves so far from the evil, or attempt to affect it by inaplicable religious rules, that it only laughs at our efforts and grows daily stronger. Take intemperance for example. As scarcely a traveler comes to America without expressing his astonishment at the extent of this vice, so does one rarely return from Germany without testifying to its rarity. I have seen scarcely a dozen intoxicated men in the land. In this city, with ninety thousand inhabitants, the arrests for intoxication during the last two months were eighty-two and ninety-four respectively, marking an average of eleven hundred a year. In Boston, with double the population, there were in the last year, fourteen thousand six hundred arrests for drunkenness. We have the farce of temperance pledges, which, with laws to back them, would be well enough, and which now save several youths yearly from destruction. In Germany I never heard of such a thing, nor knew anybody that did not drink wine or beer; yet observe the difference in the two countries. Here light wines and beer ar universal, very cheap, within the means of every family, and are drunk openly. Thus the charm of secret drinking and sly tippling is done away with, because no one is ashamed to drink any more than to eat. Every restaurant is under strict license, and the surveillance of the police; in the greater part of them nothing stronger than beer is sold, and the number of those which dispense whiskey and strong liquors is very small. In these latter houses, our interesting quarrels and midnight orgies are unknown. With us every little liquor dealer, restricted just now, not by moral feeling but by income taxes, deals out the vile and poisonous stock in trade to any and every wretch who chooses to invest in it. He is responsible to no one, he feeds and breeds drunkards at his leisure. And in the meanwhile what is the moral community doing? Why it is standing upon its isolated pedestal flourishing the total abstinance pledge. It is saying, "You shall not drink a drop, or you may drink what and where you please." "You must swear to total abstinence, and if you are so depraved as to continue your taste for those weapons of the destroyer "mild ale" and "claret," why you shall not only have those, but poisonous and fiery liquors shall be plentifully dealt out to you. Your vilest tates shall be pampered and ministered to, you shall have gilded saloons on purpose to get drunk in and nobody shall stir to save you from your fate." "There is no middle ground; we are opposed to drinking, violently opposed to it, so much so that we prefer to save fifty or sixty cold water recruits, than raise the condition of the fourteen thousand drunkards of last year's record. Can we save those drunkards? No, for by doing so we must license moderate drinking and that is against our principles." And so the evil exists as it always will and must exist until the millennium, in spite of total abstinence. Why not accept and make the most of it? Give the people something decent to drink, limit the number of saloons in order that a man may not get drunk within sight of his doorstep, institute rational amusements which shall call the drunkard from his stived cellar, make good and cheap malt liquors, and keep the tax on whiskey.

There is another matter in which our exclusive morality is injuring us. We have so high a regard for the chaste, that we have nearly lost our pity for the unchaste. We forget that in the contempt with which we regard prostitution the evil itself thrives. Those that descend are lost forever to those who remain, and who are so actively engaged in admiring their own virtue that they have no room for a thought of those who have lost theirs. In all continental cities the strictest regard is paid to the health and condition of these miserable creatures, their houses or dens are visited and reported by police and physicians and consequently a fearful amount of disease and crime under which our system labors is in a great part avoided. Perhaps some object to thus ministering to crime, but this vice unfortunately thrives by neglect. It is universal, no community however polished is free from it. But by contempt and abandonment it sinks infinitely below its own original level, and breeds a hundred vices vile as itself. By ignoring it we allow it to spread its disease and crime, it thrives by our apathy, and as it thrives becomes more degraded. There is no such such street-walking and bawdy saloon singing here, as with us, no such entrapping of young men, and prostitution itself is subject to the strictest rules.

As in an aristocracy the magnificence of one party is always attended by the correspondiug poverty and ignorance of the class ministers to it, so in America the exclusive and astonishing rigid moral tone of a part of society, added to its fear of licensing vice or controling it in the slightest degree, has spread through the ranks outside the pale, a double portion of the vices of which we are trying to rid ourselves. The moral and religious tone of that exclusive circle may be higher than elsewhere in the world, but that the general average is lower, certainly regarding the vices to which I have alluded. I have no doubt. There are some little minor observances of morality here which are interesting and remind one of the inconsistencies of Catholic countries. For example, dancing halls for public balls are open every Saturday evening, but the law compels them to close at midnight, as at that time the Sabbath hours begin. But on Sunday evening the same halls, as well as the theater, are open again, as the latter part of this is usually devoted in Germany to recreation, as the earlier part to church going. If, however, in a public dancing hall on Saturday night the proprietor thinks it would be profitable to keep open later than twelve o'clock, he goes to the police office, pays a small fine, gives notice of his evil intention and is allowed to dance in peace till the gray dawn of Sabbath morning. This is very like buying off one's purgatory pains in Catholic lands. And speaking of this last, did it never occur to such a dying sinner to ask if the firm was good which negotiated his exchange with the "gentleman in black," or to what particular fiend it would be best to make his draft paybable?

Moreover, Germans are really the most kind and hospitable of people; they don't give you poor coffee nor boardinghouse dinners, they stick to their bargains in that sense; they sell you good articles and go infinitely out of their way to suit your fancy or taste; but if you are a stranger you must pay for it. It is a settled article of their creed that Englishmen and Americans can afford to pay whatever they choose to demand. To sum up this, their moral behavior, I find the cities as quiet, orderly, and sober as our New England towns; I don't know to this day what the uniform of a police officer is, nor where they keep themselves; I have been at fires, in crowds, have enjoyed three days of carnival, when Leipsic was distended with people like a rubber coach, and lived three days in Dresden with a hundred thousand foreign soldiers, but I have yet to see my first German street fight, or in fact any disorderly conduct. If it is German law that renders these cities so delightful, we ought to import some of it free of taxation. If it is the people themselves naturally so sober and orderly, we should be thankful that so many of them are coming over to our side of the water.

THEATRICAL STATISTICS.—The following figures as to the capacity of some of the great theatres of Europe may be of interest. The Della Scalla, of Milan, accomodates 4,000 spectators, has six tiers of boxes (they are called boxes in Europe up to the last tier, which is the "gallery.") Its stage is 150 feet deep. The St. Carlo, of Naples, seats 3,500; the Carlo Felice, in Genoa, 3,000; the Fenive, in Venice, 2,700; Theatre Peale, in Turin, 2,000. The Imperial Opera House, of Vienna, 3,100, and is, therefore, the third largest in Europe. The older theatres have, throughout, five tiers of galleries, the more modern only four.

At St. Quentin, France, two ostriches were recently being exhibited, tho showman always warning visitors to take care of their jewelry. Recently, one of the spectators, with a gold chain hanging from his pocket, did not think it necessary to attend to the warning; but, to his dismay, one of the ostriches suddenly caught the chain, dragged it, with the watch to which it was attached, from the pocket, and swollowed both. The man clamorously demanded from the showman the value of the watch and chain; and the commissary of police decided that he should pay forty francs damages.

A Fraulien Grantzow, a famous dancer of St. Petersburg has received a present of a diadem of precious stones, and a bouquet that filled an entire carriage. Ten thousand pounds a year is the rate of her engagement. The acrobat business is looking up. Leotard gets four thousand pounds for a six months' engagement, in Paris, this year.

WHY IT IS SUPERIOR.—Mrs. Mary A. McLaughlin, 36 Lewis street, New York, states as follows:

Q—From your knowledge of the work performed by other machines what superiority does the Grover & Baker machines have over any other?

A—The Grover & Baker and the Wheeler & Wilson Machines are all I know. I gave the Wheeler & Wilson Machine up because it would not perform my work as well as the Grover & Baker. my work is ladies' cloaks. The Grover & Baker Machine does the very finest and the very coarsest, with the same plate and the same needle, and I could not do that with the other machine. I think the stitch in the Grover & Baker machine is the most elastic. I like it better than any other machine I know of.

[From testimony taken before the U. S. Commissioner of Patents, on the application for the extension of the patent for the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine.]

MILLINERY AND HEAD-DRESSES.—Mrs. Winship has just received, per last steamer, the latest Parisian Millinery Goods and Lacos for HEAD-DRESS, consisting in part of Breakfast Caps, Point Application, Laco Vallenciumes, and the Widow's Rooche, worn by the crown heads of Europe, and the only first imported to the Pacific Coast. Queen Emma, while here, replenished her wardrobe from the stock then and now on hand, at MRS. WINSHIP, No. 23 Post Street, under the Mechanics' Institute. Through the influence of Queen Emma, Mrs. Winship has filled quite a number of orders for the foreign population of Honolulu. The ladies of San Francisco should call and examine these beautiful Goods, by which means they will secure the Latest Fashionable Styles.

WHAT'S THE MATTER?—In passing through Third street yesterday, we saw crowds of people entering a building a few doors below Market street, and we inquired of a passer-by what's the matter? He answered that they were going to have their pictures taken in the NEW YORK PHOTOGRAPHIC GALLERY, and the cause of the rush was that this took the best and cheapest pictures in the city; the inducement must be much to draw so big a crowd from Montgomery and the other streets in the northern part of the city.

MAYER'S BAZAAR.—R. Mayer offers at his Bazaar, corner Pine and Montgomery streets, the greatest variety of jewelry, watches, silver plated ware, guitars, music boxes; concertinas, accordeons, opera glasses, etc., etc., to the public of San Francisco, and to the country trade, at prices that defy competition, and is determined to close out his present stock at greatly reduced rates. His heavy case silver watches from the American Watch Company are superior to anything ever before offered to the public. These watches are taking the place of heavy gold watches from the fact that the workmanship is superior, the casings pure silver, and the prices low. The sale of these watches is very extensive on the Pacific coast. Another proof that American manufactures can beat the world. The works are made of platina and never get out of repair. French opera glasses of great power for sale or hire, and all kinds of musical instruments, eight day family clocks, etc. This is a rare chance to invest your money to advantage, at Mayer's Bazaar, southeast corner of Montgomery and Pine streets.

N. B.—An immense assortment of Japanese curiosities for sale.

WAGONS.

MILLS & EVANS, IMPORTERS OF THOROUGH-BRACE Wagons, light express, two and three spring Wagons, suitable for milk-men and furniture dealers, and others wishing light and durable Wagons. Their Wagons are made expressly for the California market, and Mills & Evans' is the only firm which receives Wagons from the celebrated manufactory of A. W. Sanborn & Co., Manchester, N. H. This latter firm stands A No. 1 in the east, and their wagons have stood the test of our California climate, and are sold by Mills & Evans fifty per cent. lower than any other establishment on the Pacific coast. Call and examine their Wagons, at No. 587 Market street, opposite the Metropolitan market. *

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

Mechanics' Institute

RESOURCES OF CALIFORNIA.

THE MECHANICS' INSTITUTE OF SAN FRANcisco hereby OFFER A PREMIUM OF ONE THOUSAND ($1,000) DOLLARS FOR THE BEST ESSAY ON THE "RESOURCES OF CALIFORNIA, AND BEST METHOD OF DEVELOPING THE SAME," under the following conditions:—One-half of the premium in cash on the certified award of the Committee of Judges, and the balance from the first proceeds of sales of the successful work, which is to belong to, and will be published by, the Institute.

The Essays are to be handed into the Librarian of the Institute on or before the FIRST DAY OF JUNE, 1868, and the award to be made by the Judges at the opening of the Industrial Exhibition, which is to be held in August or September following. The Essay should be divided into three heads, viz: Mineral, Agricultural and Industrial Resources, with proper subdivisions of each subject. It should be sufficient in quantity to form a duodecimo (12mo) volume of from 250 to 300 pages long primer type solid.

Writers will sign their articles in cypher, and send their names and address in sealed envelopes, which will be kept in a secure place by the Institute, and only be opened when the award is made. The manuscripts of unsuccessful writers will be returned to them without publicity.

The Committee of Judges have the right to reject all Essays, in case they do not consider them worthy of publication or the premium. No further instructions than are contained in this advertisement will be given to the Committee, nor will they be subjected to any advice from the officers or members of the institute in regard to their proposed action. All manuscript submitted must be in clear, legible writing, so as to admit of easy reading.

The following named gentleman, who have been selected for their well-known ability, public spirit and integrity of purpose, will compose the Committee of Judges:

Hon. FREM'K. F. LOW,	Maj. Gen. H. W. HALLECK,
Prof. J. D. WHITNEY,	U. S. A.,
JAMES OTIS,	Prof. WM. B. EWER,
WM. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS,	B. N. BUCEY.

By order of the Board of Directors.

ANNIVERSARY
—OF OUR—
NATIONAL INDEPENDENCE!
JULY 4th, 1867.

NOTICE OF INVITATION.

The undersigned, having been entrusted with the duties of Grand Marshal of the Celebration of the coming Anniversary of our National Independence, would hereby extend a CORDIAL INVITATION to all Bodies Institutions, Organizations, Trades, Schools, etc., and to all Citizens of the United States, and to all residents within our midst, to unite with the the Citizens of San Francisco, in making the coming demonstration one worthy of our glorious country and an honor to our city.

It is to be hoped there will be a gorgeous and commendable enthusiasm manifested on this occasion and that all classes of our citizens will use their individual efforts to add to the magnitude of the display.

With a united country standing higher than ever in the estimation of the Nations of the globe, let it be proven that we ourselves appreciate the glorious boon we have inherited, and which has been maintained intact to the present day. All for our country, "undivided and undividable."

SPECIAL INVITATIONS will be issued at the earliest possible moment.

☞ Notice of the Acceptance of this Invitation is requested as soon as convenient on the part of Public Organizations.

Respectfully, etc.,

GEORGE W. SMILEY.
Grand Marshal.

WHIP HIM FOR HIS MOTHER.

Let me whip him for his mother,
He is such a naughty boy;
He haby tried to smother,
And he's broken Emma's toy.
Of the doll I gave to Ellen,
He has melted off her nose,
And there reality is no telling
To what length his mischief goes.

Last night he put a craker
'Neath his Aunt Jemima's chair,
And he told me such a whacker
When I asked how came it there.
Then when poor old Mrs. Toodles
Was just starting off by rail
He tied her two fat poodles
Fast together hy the tail!

It really is quite shocking
How one's nerves he daily jars,
He puts pins into one's stockings,
And Cayeune in one's cigars,
You may guess that many auother
Boysh trick he's daily at,
So I'll whip him for his mother,
As a tiresome little brat.

THE DOGS.

Few persons are aware of the value and variety of dogs, varying as they do in weight from 180 pounds to less than one pound, and in value to about $500 to less than nothing. A decription of the different varieties may not be uninteresting.

The Siberian bloodhound weighs about 160 pounds and measures 40 inches in girth, and is worth nearly 500 dollars.

The St. Bernard dog, which is of a buff or light lead color, is very large and valuable.

The Newfoundland dog, when pure, is entirely black, and its pups are worth from 10 to 20 dollars.

The shepherd dog, or Scotch colly, is wonderful for its patience, fidelity and bravery. It is worth from 50 to 100 dollars.

The English mastiff, a good watch dog, is worth from 15 to 25 dollars.

Of terries, the black and tan is most admired. It varies in weight from 1 pound to 25 pounds and increases its value as it decreases in weight, A member of the bar in this city has one which weighs less than a pound and is the smallest we have ever seen. It could not be bought for $150. The Scotch terrier is the hardiest of dogs, is very courageous, and is worth from ten to thirty dollars.

The Scotch deerhound is the rarest and most valuable of hunting dogs. They are very rare and owned principally by the nobility of England. They are worth $100 each.

The beagle is the hound kind, of superior, scent and endurance, and is the best sort of a rabbit hunter.

Engligh greyhounds, the fleetest of Dogs are worth from $25 to $100 each. The Italian greyhonnd is merely a parlor dog. The pnre breed is rare and valuable, a fine one being worth $150.

The Prince Charles is supposed to have originated in Japan, where a similar breed exists. He has a round head, short nose, long curly ears, large full eyes, black and tan color and never weighs over ten pounds. They have been sold at anction in England, at 2,600 dollars each.

The coach dog is from Denmark, and is not of much value.—Buffalo Gazette.

The following programme of music is advertised to be given at a forthcoming concert for the "Benefit of Lost or Strayed Dogs:" Overture—"The Dorg of Venice." Barkaroylle—"The Land! the new found Land!" Waltz—"Quel chien de metier." Song—"Poor Dog Tray." Scene—"The cur-few tolls." Quadrille—"Jolly Dogs." Song—"O! am I not a cur?" Duet—"Our Native Skye." Symphony—"The Strange Bark."

ANOTHER DOCTOR IN THE CITY.

DR. H. A. BENTON has been performing many wonderful cures in this city the past two years, and as his practice is fast increasing at the office, finds it difficult to attend outside calls, concluded to invite R. H. OLMSTEAD, M. D., of Napa City, to join him. Dr. Olmstead has been 18 years successfully treating obstioate cases, with water, electricity, and the magnetic forces, (and when needed, Eclectic Remedies, of which he is a graduate of that school); also, heing the seventh son of a celebratcd Physician, and having a powerful organization, his magnetic hands, like magic, dispel pain and disease in a wonderful manner; he is also a natural Bone Setter.

DR. OLMSTEAD has this day associated with Dr. H. A. BENTON, the Medical Electrician and Homœpathist, at his office, 314 Bush street, San Francisco, who, having all the necessary facilities, such as the Patent Electro-Chemical, Sulphur, Vapor, Hot Air, and Medicated Baths, which are valuable aids in removing all curable diseases, whether acute or chronic. The combined skill, together with the aid of an excellent Lady Assistant, gives an assurance of CURE TO MANY, BENEFIT TO ALL, AND INJURY TO NONE.

POP.

And there they sat a-popping corn,
John Stiles and Susan Cutter;
John Stiles as fat as any ox,
And Susan fat as butter.

And there they sat and shelled the corn,
And raked and stirred the fire,
And talked of different kinds of ears,
And hitched their chairs the nigher.

Then Susan, she the popper shook,
Then, John, he shook the popper,
Till both their faces looked as red
As saucepans made of copper.

And they shelled, and popped and ate,
All kinds of fun a-poking,
While he haw haw'd at her remarks,
And she laughed at his joking.

And stilled they popped, and still they ate—
John's mouth was like a hopper—
And stirred the fire, and sprinkled salt,
And shook and shook the popper.

The clock struck nine, the clock struck ten,
And still the corn kept popping—
It struck eleven, and then struck twelve,
And still no sign of stopping.

And John, he ate, and Sue, she thought—
The corn did pop and patter,
Till John cried out: "The corn's a-fire!
Why, Susan, what's the matter?"

Says she, "John Stiles, it's one o'clock—
You'll die of indigestion;
I'm sick of all this popping corn—
Why don't you pop the question?"

THE West has a new sensation. A young man is in the habit of visiting the large cities, and in front of some of the finest residences, usually where a couple of young ladies happen to be sitting, he is suddenly taken with hemorrhage, the blood flowing copiously from his mouth. Of course he is taken in the house where his story is that he was in the war, has a bullet in his heart, has been imprisoned and all that, which of course elicits the sympathy of the crowd and every lady comes down handsomely. The fellow recovers very rapidly and decamps'

IN the course of recent excavations at Pompeii the workmen discovered a bronze vase, hermetically closed, and enveloped in a thick crystallized crust. The interior of the vessel was found to contain a considerable quanity of water. Some persons present ventured to drink some of the liquid, and all agreed in prouncing it clear, fresh, and of remarkable softness. The water in question must have been preserved for nearly one thousand eight hundred years.

A BON-MOT IN COURT.—Two barristers were using very warm words toward each other. "Don't be afraid," said a looker-on; "they are like a pair of scissors, neither blade cuts the other, but it is dangerous work for any one that gets between."

TWO LITTLE PAIRS OF BOOTS.

BY MRS. S. C. PERRY.

Two little pairs of boots, to-night,
Before the fire are drying
Two little pairs of tired feet
In a trundle-bed are lying;
The tracks they left upon the floor
Make me feel much like sighing.

Those little boots with copper toes!
They ran the livelong day!
And ofttimes I almost wish
That they were miles away!
So tired I am to hear so oft
Their heavy tramp at play

They walk about the new plowed ground,
Where mud in plenty lies,
They roll it up in marbles round,
Then bake it into pies;
And then at night upon the floor
In every shape it dries.

To day I was disposed to scold;
But when I look, to-night,
At those little boots before the fire,
With copper toes so bright,
I think how sad my heart would be
To put them out of sight.

For in a trunk, upstairs, I've laid
Two socks of white and blue;
If called to put these boots away,
O God, what should I do?
I mourn that there are not, to-night
Three pairs instead of two.

I mourn because I thought how nice
My neighbor, "cross the way,"
Could keep her carpets, all the year,
From getting worn or gray;
Yet well I know she'd smile to own some little boots to day!

We mothers weary get and worn,
Over our load of care;
But how we speak of little ones
Let each of us beware
For what would our firesides be to-night.
If no little boots were there.

WHEELING matches have recently become very popular in some portions of Pennsylvania. All the contestants for the prize are required to be blindfolded in turn, take hold of the handles of a wheelbarrow, turn three times round, and then wheel towards a stake, the one approaching nearest being the winner. When completely blindfolded the mark is pretty difficult to hit and in many cases persons will wheel very far off, or berhaps in an entirely different direction—which is of course very amusing to the spectators, if not very profitable to the "wheelers"

Ayer's Sarsaparilla
TO
Purify the Blood.

NOT A FEW OF THE WORST DISORDERS THAT afflict mankind arise from the corruption that accumulates in the blood. Of all the discoveries that have been made to purge it out, none have been found which could equal in effect AYER'S COMPOUND EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. It cleanses and renovates the blood, instills the vigor of health into the system and purges out the humors which make disease. It stimulates the healthy functions of the body, and expels the disorders that grow and rankle in the blood. Its extraordinary virtues are not yet widely known, but, when they are, it will no longer be a question what remedy to employ in the great variety of afflicting diseases that require an alterative remedy. Such a remedy, that could be relied on, has long been sought for, and now, for the first time, the public have one on which they can depend. Our space here does not admit certificates to show its effects. But the trial of a single bottle will show to the sick that it has virtues surpassing anything they have ever taken. Sufferers from Scrofula, Scrofulous Swellings and Sores, try it and see the rapidity with which it cures. Skin Diseases, Pimples, Pustules, Blotches, Eruptions, etc., are soon cleaned out of the system.
St. Anthony's Fire, Rose or Erysipelas, Tetter or Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Ringworm, etc., should not be borne while they can be so speedily cured by AYER'S SARSAPARILLA.
Syphilis or Venereal Disease is expelled from the system by the prolonged use of this SARSAPARILLA, and the patient is left as healthy as if he never had the disease.
Female Diseases are caused by Scrofula in the blood, and are generally soon cured by this EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. Price $1 per bottle, or 6 bottles for $5.
For all the purposes of a family physic, take AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS, which are everywhere known to be the best purgative that is offered to the American People.
Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass., and sold by all Druggists and dealers in medicine everywhere.

TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

NEW REMEDIES! NEW REMEDIES!

Dr. Gibbon's Dispensary.

ESTABLISAED IN 1854,
616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco.

For the treatment of Sexual and Seminal Diseases, such as gonorrhœa, gleet, stricture, syphilis in all its forms, seminal weakness, impotency, &c. Skin Disenses, (of years' standing,) and Ulcerated legs, successfully treated.

HORRIBLE DISEASES.

How many thousands of persons both male and female are there who are suffering out a miserable existence from the effects of secret indulgence, or from virus absorbed into the system. Look at their pallid, emaciated and disfigured faces, and their broken constitutions, disqualifying them for the happiness of marriage or the enjoyment of life. In this horrid situation thousands suffer until death closes the scene. Let parents, guardians and friends, attend to those who are suffering with any of these horrible, life-destroying maladies—see that they are cared for and cured before it be too late. Send them to Dr. Gibbon, a physician who has made private diseases his especial study for years, and who is certain to cure the most inveterate cases without mercury or any injurious drugs. It is important to those who are afflicted, to be careful of the many pretended Doctors who infest all cities, publishing their skill in curing all diseases in a few days, imposing upon the public by using the names of eminent physicians from Europe and other places. Be therefore careful and make strict inquiry, or you may fall into the hands of these charlatans.

Syphilis is syphilis the world over; so is small pox, consumption, and other diseases, to the contrary of what quacks may say.

SEMINAL WEAKNESS.

Seminal weakness the consequent of self abuse. This solitary vice, or depraved sexual indulgence, is practiced by the youth of both sexes to an almost unlimited extent, producing with unnering certainty the following train of morbid symptoms, unless combatted by scientific medical measure; sallow countenances, dark spots under the eyes, pain in the head, ringing in the ears, noise like the rustling of leaves and rattling of chariots, uneasiness about the loins, weakness of the limbs, confused vision, blunt intellect, loss of confidence, diffidence in approaching strangers, a dislike to form new acquaintances, a disposition to shun society, loss of memory, hectic flushes, pimples and various eruptions about the face, furred tongue, fetid breath, coughs, consumption, night sweats, monomania, and frequent insanity. If relief be not obtained, should apply immediately, either in person or by letter, and have a cure effected by his new and scientific mode of treating this complaint, which never fails of effecting a quick and radical cure. Dr. G. will give $100 to any person who will prove satisfactorily to him that he was cured by either of the San Francisco quacks.

Dr. Gibbon is responsible, and will give each patient a written instrument binding himself to effect a radical and permanent cure or make no charge.

Persons at a distance may be cured at home by addressing a letter to Dr. Gibbon, stating case, symptoms, length of time the disease has continued, and have medicine promptly forwarded, free from damage and curiosity, to any part of the country, with full and plain directions for use, for ten dollars, sent in a registered letter, or through Wells, Fargo & Co.

Address DR. J. F. GIBBON, 616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco, Postoffice Box 252.

CAUTION TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

Beware of the San Francisco quacks and pretenders who with bogus sworn-to certificates, dupe the unwary. Some of the self styled doctors whose names are to be found in all the daily and weekly papers of San Francisco and other places, are tradesmen, and become too lazy to work at their trade. Some are tinsmiths, shoemakers, newspaper carriers, intelligence offices keepers, etc. Look over the San Francisco City Directory and you will find their former occupation in it. Look at the Directory for 1862-63. The only way to avoid imposition is make inquiry—it will cost you nothing and may save you many regrets, for advertising physicians in eight cases out of ten are bogus, there is no safety in trusting any of them till you know who and what they are. Dr. Gibbon does not deceive people by exhibiting bogus titles, certificates, pretended patients' letters, etc. Dr. Gibbon Will satisfy persons who may call at his office of his ability to treat diseases that he proposes to cure.

☞ Persons writing to Dr. Gibbon will Please state the name of the paper they see his advertisement in.

IN THE PROBATE COURT of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

In the matter of the Estate of SARAH P. PETERSON, deceased.

Order to show cause why order of distribution should not be made.

On reading and filing the petition of Frederick W. Peterson the Administrator of the Estate of Sarah P. Peterson deceased, setting forth that he has filed his final account of his administration of the estate of said deceased, in this Court, and that the same has been duly settled and allowed; that all the debts and expenses of administration have been duly paid; and that a portion of said estate remains to be divided among the heirs of said deceased, and praying among other things for an order of distribution of the residue of said estate among the persons entitled:

It is Ordered, that all persons interested in the estate of the said Sarah P. Peterson deceased, be and appear before the Probate Court of the city and county of San Francisco, at the Court Room of said Court, in the City Hall in said city and county, on MONDAY, the fifteenth day of July, A. D. 1867, at eleven o'clock, A. M., then and there to show cause why an order of distribution should not be made of the residue of said estate to the heir of said Sarah P. Peterson deceased, according to law:

It is further Ordered, that a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks, before the said fifteenth day of July, A D. 1867, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in the said city and county.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

EDWARD J. QUIRK, Plaintiff, vs. JAMES P. HORBACH, et als., Defendants

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the said city and county of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES P. HORBACH, HENRY DELVENDAHL, HENRY BREMMERMAN, ERNST JANSSEN and GUSTAV HELMKE, Defendants!

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this District, within twenty days, otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to require you, the said defendants, to set forth the nature of your respective claims to that certain lot or parcel of land situate in said city and county of San Francisco, as particularly described in the complaint herein, being subdivision No. 5 of the 100 vara lot known on the map of the city of San Francisco as No. 276, as designated on a plat of the original subdivision thereof, recorded in the office of the County Recorder of said city and County, in Liber 1 of Certified Grants, at page 156, that all adverse claims of said defendants and each of them may be determined by a decree of this Court; that by said decree it be declared and adjudged that the said defendants, each and all of them, have no estate or interest whatever in or to said parcel of land, and that the title of plaintiff thereto is good and valid; that said defendants, and each of them, be forever debarred from asserting any claim whatever in and to said land adverse to plaintiff, and for such other and further relief as to this Hon. Court shall seem meet and agreeable to equity, with costs of suit against such of the defendants as shall defend this action.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, this 25th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven.

THE AVITOR "HERMES."

The following Report has been addressed to the Pattentee of the Avitor, by G. K. Gluyas, Esq., President of the Mechanic's Institue, and Superintending Engineer of the California S. N. Company.

Report of the Construction and Prospects of the

"AVITOR:"

SAN FRANCISCO, June 7, 1867

F. MARRIOTT, ESQ—Dear Sir:—Having visited on Wednesday last, the Avitor building, at Shell Mound Park, and inspected the machine, I take the pleasure in recording my impressions in favor of this invention. I was careful to learn details, and to study the Avitor, in order to speak, so far as I might be, with knowledge; and I am satisfied that the principle here followed is the right one.

The machine is light, solid and well finished. I think there is needed greater capacity for holding of gas, and a modification of the machine to enable it to be compressed, that the gas-holder may the more readily be filled with pure gas. The arrangements for controlling and managing the different portions of the machinery could not be better; the engine I think adequate to perform all the services required of it. As regards the probable velocity of the Avitor, I would say nothing. Once afloat, and I see nothing to hinder its floating; it is merely a question of resistance. For an invention so novel, the Avitor has met with comparatively few practical obstacles; and when it is remembered that the difficulties in the way of Fulton's experiment were much greater than those that have kept back the Avitor, and that the principal is in both cases equally sound it will be seen that there are good reasons for the belief that the machine, with the modifications referred to, will yet successfully navigate the air.

The experiments with petroleum as a steam generator, which, no doubt, will be successful, will furnish a compact and light fuel for generating steam. After the Avitor has been floated, there may be some slight changes of the propelling machinery suggested, but, ultimately, it must be a success. The expense to make the contemplated changes, or rather enlargement, of the machine, I think, will be under three thousand dollars.

Hoping and firmly believing in the success of your enterprise, I remain your obedient servant,

GEO. K. GLUYAS.

OPINION OF PETER DONAHUE ESQ.

I have followed with great interest, and have personally observed the construction of the Avitor. I am so thoroughly convinced of the practicability of the enterprise, and so entirely concur in the foregoing observations of Geo. K. Gluyas, Esq., respecting the two modifications to be adopted, that I have no hesitation in saying that, when these changes are made, the Avitor will answer all the purposes of its inventor, and fully realize the expectations of the public. As soon as the elevating power shall, in this way, have been perfected, the work will be completed because the propelling force is ample, the machinery for elevating and depressing sufficient, and steering apparatus in fine working order, and, in short, the whole of the Avitor is fully under the control of the operation. GRAND TRIAL

....OF....

SEWING MACHINES.

CONTEST BETWEEN THE

FLORENCE AND WILLCOX & GIBBS.

THE

WILLCOX & GIBBS

TRIUMPHANT!

At the Great UNION FAIR, held at Island Park, between Albany and Troy, in September, two Premiums were offered on Sewing Machines, one for the BEST and the other for the "Second Best"—competition being open to the State.

On the first day of the Fair, the Troy Agent of Florence Sewing Machine Company, having, jointly with the Albany Agent of the same Machine, entered it for competition, published in the Troy Daily Times a challenge to Agents of other Sewing Machines, to meet them at said Fair and compete with them for the Premium.

The challenge was accepted by the Troy and Albany Agents of the Willcox and Gibbs Machine.

Each party was to prepare and subject to the judges a "list" of the several "points of merit" on account of which "superiority" was claimed. These "points" were to be separately considered, thoroughly investigated and practically tested, by work done then and there, upon each of the machines; and then decided in favor of the machine which was adjudged to excel on that "point."

Finally it was agreed that the machine which, at the conclusion of the trial, should be found to have the greatest number of those "points" decided in its favor should be decided the "BEST SEWING MACHINE," and awarded the FIRST PREMIUM.

The result of the trial was, that the

and the prize, by the extraordinary superiority of thirty-five points, decided in its favor, against two points in favor of the Florence.

Full notes were taken of the trial.

It is a fact worthy of remark, that during the entire trial—which continued without intermission for nearly seven hours—not a stitch was missed, nor the thread once broken, nor a needle broken or bent, by the Willcox and Gibbs machine. No kind of work was attempted to be done on it that was not accomplished, and done in a perfect and workmanlike manner; and no effort was made on it that was not entirely successful; while neither of these statements can be truly made in favor of the Florence.

This remarkable trial can not fail, through the facts developed by it, to be productive of important results. It has raised the veil and exposed to public view the true character of the opposition, who will no longer be able to deceive the public by misrepresenting the character and merits of the Willcox and Gibbs machine.

It is an improvement on double thread machines; and its "stitch," which was severely tested by the Judges, was decided to be much stronger and less liable to rip in use or wear than the "Lock Stitch."

It is the simplest in construction—does the greatest variety of work—makes no noise—is not liable to get out of order—costs the least money, and gives the best satisfaction.

An Injured Dutchman.

The other Sunday a party of gentlemen while sailing on the Bay in the yacht Queen of the Bay, observed a dark object bobbing up and down in the water at some distance from them. They thought at first it was a porpoise, but on one of the party suggesting that it might be a man they bore down towards the floating object. They soon came close enough to perceive that it was actually a man who was throwing his arms in the air, sinking and then rising again to the surface. They rescued him in an almost exhausted condition. They found he was a Dutchman who had been out for a pull in his boat which had upset and cast him into the sea. Every attention was paid to him after he was taken into the boat, the gentlemen stripped themselves of their coats to cover him as he lay almost insensible and benumbed with the cold. In order to revive him, large quantities of prime old Bourbon were administered to him from time to time. He was landed in San Francisco and escorted to his house by one of the party, who left him feeling warm and comfortable. Two days afterwards this gentleman went to see how the man he had rescued from a dreadful death was. Slapping him on the shoulder, he said: "Well, my friend, how are you now?" The Dutchman staring at him stolidly, answered, "I pees very well. How you pees?" "Yes," said the gentleman, "but you wouldn't be very well if we hadn't made pretty good sailing." "Oh," said the Dutchman "you pees one of dem fellers das was find me in der vasser. I know you now. You vas pulled me out of der vasser, and you vas give me de most Got tum pad whiskey as I never have drunk, my head ache all der night and all der next day, Got tam!"

Ten Tons of School Books.

A dispatch dated New York, June 26th, announces that Putnam & Son, booksellers, have shipped 10 tons of school books for Japan. The question is: when the Japanese Government receives them what will it do with them? These school-books cannot be copies of "Japanese without a master" because no such book has been published as yet. Will the Government be able to find 10 teachers—one to each ton of school-books—capable of instructing the Japs in translating the First Reader? Would it not be well for the Board of Education of San Francisco who have so many more applications for positions as teachers in our public schools than they can grant, to do the civil thing towards the Japanese Government and send it a few hundred teachers well up in the First Reader? (The shipment includes 13,000 elemen tary books.) They would learn Japanese in the course of time. Send them to Japan. If we have not any grown up Japs here to instruct us in their language, we have a Japanese baby—that's something to begin with. It will be able to talk soon, and arrangements might possibly be made by the Board of Education with its happy guardian to allow it to give lessons in Japanese to the teachers. We fear exceedingly that the 10 tons of school-books will be of little use unless some such action is taken.

Prayers for the Press.

The Bulletin's New York correspondent says:

"The Presbyterians in session at Rochester have been discussing a proposition that the Assembly should institute special prayers for persons connected with the Press in the United States One of the speakers made eloquent reference to the hardships of the daily reporter, and another expressed an earnest desire that he (the reporter) should hereafter be more frequently the subject of special prayer. This is all very well, for as everybody knows, the reporting fraternity are a graceless set. But are there not other classes who equally deserve a like special attention? There are the lawyer and pastor, the grocer, the butcher, and, above all, the landlord. Why should they be neglected and only the newspaper reporter specially remembered?"

We think this correspondent is very ungrateful for this special mercy. For ourselves we are thankful and hope that the Presbyterians will pray for all connected with the Press, from the editor down to the devil. We are a little afraid, however, that some clergymen will take to praying at the Press instead of for them.

A Russian "Bear."

A gentleman residing in Oakland, signing his initials J. J.W., makes an effort to bear Russian Territory stock by writing a letter to one of the morning papers in which he calls it "an isolated, God forsaken country." We don't believe a word of it. We are up to J. J. W.'s little game. He's afraid that all the inhabitants of Oakland will emigrate to this glorious land. He says:

"The resources of the country are entirely unknown, even to the Russians themselves, inasmuch as they live in constant dread of the Indians, and consequently, are not disposed to risk their lives among such furious neighbors. Some of the tribes are thieving murderers and pirates; in fact, it would not be safe to start anywhere on a prospecting tour except in parties numbering from eighty to one hundred well armed men."

We know better than that, haven't we been told that turnips and carrots grow there? Aren't the Indians in the far North proverbially good-natured, the ice keeping them always cool? The heat of anger is unknown there. They never let their angry passions rise. J. J. W. owns that "the female Indians are remarkably handsome, with small hands and feet," and that 'the Indians inhabiting the Aluntien Islands are civilized, courteous, with habits of industry, and are of very great service to the Russians, who treat them with great consideration and kindness." One of the grave accusations which J. J. W. makes against this territory, is the fact that the supply of furs has become so great as to cease to be profitable to the Russian-American Fur Company, which consequently relinquished the trade. Yet at this day there are thousands of unhappy women in San Francisco who are unable, in consequence of their poverty, to purchase sable capes. It won't do, J. J. W. Thieves, murderers, and pirates won't frighten Californians. Bears won't scare them. A large immigration will take place to this favored land, and thousands of unfortunate, free-born American citizens who, oppressed by our heartless capitalists, are working eight hours a day for two dollars a day, will go to Uncle Sam's new territory, live in comfort, luxuriate on turnips, and acquire immense fortunes by shooting wild animals and skinning them.

Ghostly Criticism.

There is a large class of people for whom some things may be done too well. If somebody has an engrossing taste for circus performances you must not be disappointed if he takes coldly to Hamlet. Such a man might criticise Hamlet and carve him in giblets because he did not perform on horseback. Judgment in such matters depends much on taste, education and early surroundings. The thinking public would probably give to the horseback Hamlet's opinion all due respect and attention, taking as much of it as conformed to their ideas of propriety relative to the matter. Probably they would leave the horse out.

A few mornings since the individual of dramatic proclivities who serves up amusement notices, dignified by the title of criticisms for the Alta, objected to Mr. Henry Edwards' dress in the character of Banquo. Now the probabilities are largely in favor of the fact that Mr. Edwards was the only correctly dressed character in the cast. He has occupied a position as manager for many years, is a gentleman of refined and scholarly tastes, and is thoroughly devoted to his profession. True, considerable latitude of opinion should be allowed with regard to the proper dressing of ghosts. They are not common. Perhaps the human being who wants to criticise, will criticise, and cannot be withheld from dramatic criticism, has seen more ghosts than Mr. Edwards, and therefore his opinion on ghostly fashions is entitled to respect.

An Unscrupulous Assertion.

In these times of political excitement, newspapers are too apt to become utterly demoralized, and make statements in the most reckless manner—statements which often bear upon their face the proof of their falsity. The Evening Dispatch has, perhaps, made fewer reckless assertions regarding the candidates for office on the opposing sides than any other paper published in this city. Under these circumstances we were shocked at reading in last Monday's issue the following:

"An Italian troubadour, while standing on the string of Pacific wharf, yesterday morning, enchanting a small crowd with the exquisite strains of his instrument, became so absorbed in his own melodious creations, that he forgot his precarious position and toppled over into the bay. He was rescued by the bystanders, with no other injury than a wholesome drink of saltwater."

Does the Dispatch intend seriously to assert that the Bay in the vicinity of Pacific street wharf affords a wholesome drink of saltwater? Did or did not the local of the aforesaid paper observe three feline, two canine corpses and one equine corpse floating on the surface of the Bay on that Sabbath morn in close proximity to the place where the Italian plunged into the sewerage of San Francisco? A "wholesome drink of saltwater" forsooth! We have lost confidence in the Dispatch, the pool of politics is not more foul than the water of the Bay at the foot of Pacific street, and the editors will not be afraid to plunge in for the purpose of obtaining "a wholesome drink" after making such a statement as above recorded. We are not acquainted with the local of the Dispatch, and are constrained to ask: "Has he a nose?"

The "Alta's" Satirical Editor.

One of the editors of the Alta, M. G. Upton, is at present enlarging his mind by foreign travel, and writing letters from Paris about the Exposition. We are afraid he will offend many readers by the cruelly satirical manner in which he criticises the American display. California it appears, is miserably represented. He says:

"In the centre of that apartment is a show case of very moderate dimensions—something larger than the cases in which fancy boots and shoes are displayed; and of a funeral aspect withal. This is devoted to two States known by the names of California and Nevada. For even this poor chance to air our products in the light of the civilized world, we are indebted, I believe, to the patriotism of one of our private citizens. The specimens displayed are not by any means as numerous, as valuable, or as rare as those contained in the mineral cabinet of the counting-room of the ALTA CALIFORNIA"

We think Mr. Upton might have been thoughtful enough for the credit of the State to have borrowed the Alta California's mineral cabinet from the counting-room and taken it with him. He then proceeds to sneer at ladies' boots and shoes from New York, says French boots are better and—oh! the wretch—libels his fair country women thus:

"The idea conveyed by the case, or rather its contents, is that the ladies of the New World are all of Colossal stature. There must be ladies of Herculean proportions to suit such enormous feet."

The air of Paris has not proved healthy to Mr. Upton. About the only words of praise he bestows on anything American, are the following:

"I now look with pride on the shelves of false teeth and the dentist's chair from New York, which I see on my right, and also on the false arms and legs which I see in the adjoining case. Here we are in our glory We have lost more teeth and more arms and legs than any people in the world, and we are able to supply them better when they are gone."

This sort of thing will never do for the Alta. It will lose advertisements by scores if it runs down American manufactures in this manner. We believe Mr. Upton is prejudiced. In the same issue of the Alta in which this letter appears, is published the report of the Paris Exposition, from which it appears that $1,145 were collected to pay for freight of articles to Paris, and that of this sum only $139 50 had been expended, leaving a balance on hand of $1,005 50. Professor Blake wrote, asking for $800, which was directed to be forwarded to him, and the Grand Exposition Committee finished their highly satisfactory labors. We understand that so little interest was taken by any person concerned in this affair that there is not in the Exposition one pint of California peanuts. Mr. Upton is a little rough, but we fear that the display is indeed very rough as regards quantity. It is comforting, after reading this letter, to turn to the telegraphic dispatch in another column of the Alta, which goes to prove that Americans made up in the quality of their display, for what it lacked in grandeur as a whole. We are told that of 524 United States exhibitors there have been awards in favor of 262 including 4 grand prizes, 17 gold medals, 62 silver medals and 103 bronze medals. Seventy-nine exhibitors received honorable mention.

Our Police Court.

Visiting the San Francisco Police Court, a few days since, after a long absence, we found things criminally, legally and locally exactly in statu quo. Judge Rix still preponderated on the bench. He has outlived, sat down upon and squelched the outcry made against him about the period of his entry into office, months ago. Lounderback still prosecutes, looking interesting and scholarly. Samuel Platt, Esq., was there The task of his biography including all his smart sayings, belongs to the Call. Zabriskie was there, still preserving his reputation as a well-dressed man. Officer Hess still tends door and has arrived at a great degree of skill and perfection in opening and shutting that door. Officer Welch still lives, crying out from time to time mechanically "Drunk, your Honor," and "Silence in the Court." Of course his Honor mechanically said occasionally "Five dollars or twenty-four hours." The average drunks were on hand, enveloped in a stifling atmosphere of dirt, seediness, headache and shame. The assaults and batteries with their accompanying black eyes and bandaged heads, and testimony of wide contradiction were there. The China chicken thief from his seat in the criminals' box, looked like a wrecked Confucius, a deeply wronged individual of a despised and persecuted race; looked as if the surreptitious seizure of a hen was, in the Flowery Kingdom, an act of devotion. The man who stole an overcoat hanging in front of a cheap clothing store, pleaded drunk, as usual, "didn't know what he was about," of course, and was promptly sent to prison, there to reflect that a part and parcel of the chief aim of existence, is letting overcoats in front of clothing stores alone until they be bought and paid for.

A Proper Spirit.

The Black Crook is about to be produced in Richmond. The Examiner solemnly warns managers that Richmond will put up with no such nonsense as "chaste dresses." These little improvements will do for the provinces; but the capital will be satisfied with nothing less than the original nudities. The Black Crook was performed in San Francisco with the characters dressed in a manner that no one but Judge Deady could deem unchaste. The consequence was that the public stayed away in disgust, and the management lost many thousands of dollars. The San Francisco public felt themselves insulted by the change made in the costumes for their special benefit. Our local Mr. Grundy said: "Well, I'm sure! I hope that my morals ain't no worse than New York, and what don't hurt them won't hurt me."

STORIES OF HISTORICAL EVENTS.

THE BATTLE OF VINEGAR HILL.

IN April, 1798, there was scarcely a farmer's house where pretty Irish girls, with frightened glances at the windows, were not cutting up rolls of innocent green ribbon into rebel cockades for the hats of fathers, brothers, and lovers. There was scarcely a lonely moonlit bawn, or old Danish encampment, where wild striplings, armed with pikes, were not practicing the right and left wheel, the rallying square, or the charge. Down many a rough country lane, between the desolate stone walls, cars were jolting with clattering loads of pike-handles. On many a mountain, from Benabola to the Scalp of Witklow, bon-fires were heaping, and stern-laced men muttering threats against the Protestants. In many a roadside chapel, behind bolted doors, grim-looking priests, with faces steeled to the work, were blessing half-naked, ragged, headstrong pikemen who were to begin the holy work and face the swinging yeomanry sabres twenty-four hours after. In dismal cabins, mere holes in the bank roofed with turf, or in hidden places between the deep chocolate-colored trenches in the bogs, where the snipe whistled, and the wild cotton, ruffled white, many a rebel forced the pike-head, kissed the green ribbons, adjusted his tailsman against bullets, or said his Aves in supplication to the Virgin that he might be guarded from the yeomanry bayonets on the morrow. The Curragh of Kildare was dark with savage pikemen; on the Wicklow mountains they were gathering in force; Limerick was alight; even in Ulster and Down there was danger; but the central crater was Wexford, for there every third man was in arms against the red-coats. From the month of the Shanley to Enniscorthy, from Hook Head to Dunbrody, the pikes were assembling, and the green ashes waiting for the fiery signals.

There is no donbt that, from 1796, the fears of a French invasion had driven the government to dangerous and oppressive severities. Repression, and not reform, was Lord Camden's primary principle. The Insurrection Act gave powers to any seven alarmed and tyrannical magistrates to assume, after requisition, the power of seizing, imprisoning, and sending to the fleet, almost without trial, any persons found an unlawful assemblies. The yeomaury were savage, thievish, and insolent; beasts of bnrden were impressed for baggage transport, without regard to private rights; the billetiug was shamefully abused; Habeas Corpus was suspended; arrests on secret information of spies were incessaut; and the seizure of arms were made a pretext for every variety of arrogant oppression. It is the last straw breaks the camel's back, the Arab says, and here was a whole truss-full.

In 1795, the year the first Orange lodge was formed, and the year before the yeomanry was organized, Napper Tandy had fled to avoid trial. Wolf Tone, a coachmaker's son, and a mischievons adventurer, had escaped to Ameriea. Dr. Jackson, an envoy from the French government, had been tried for high treason, and poisoned himself in the dock. In 1796 the government was moved to fresh severities by the nnsuccessful attempt of General Hoche, with fifteen sail-of-the-line, ten frigates, twenty-seven transports, and fifteen thousand men, to land in Bantry Bay. In 1798, Lord Camden's vigilance was unremitting, and it was by his seizure of the chief conspirators in Dublin before the day fixed for the ontbreak that the subsequent failure of the unfortunate rebellion must be mainly attributed. Mr. Reynolds, of Kilkea Castle, a retired silk-manufacturer, betrayed the Leinster delegates, who, fifteen in number, were seized at the house of Oliver Bond, a woolendraper in Bridge-street, Dublin. Robert Emmet, the son of a surgeon, afterwards hung, was among the number. The leader of the United Irishmen, Lord Edward Fitzgerald, was also arrested on the 8th of May, at the house of Murphy, a featherman, in Thomas-street. He fought desperately with a dagger, inflicting mortal wounds on a Captain Ryan, and disembowelling another officer. Lord Edward was shot in the struggle by Major Sirr, and died a month after, of his wound and mental irritation. These arrests, and those of the two Sheares, barristers, utterly disconcerted the rebels and disarranged all their plans. The police pursued the conspirators, and drove them to a hurried and permature insurrection, which was trodden out in most places bit by bit. An attempt on the night of the 23d of May, was nusuccessful, Neilson, the leader, being captured by a jailor while reconnoitring. General Lake's measures were prompt and firm. Strong pickets were placed on all the canal bridges, and militia regiments drawn up on St. Stephen's Green, the garrison and yeomanry drums beat to arms, and all the alarm-posts were instantly occupied. The country roads, alleys, gateways, stable-lanes, and byways of the Liberty, were already swarming with pikemen, lurking there ready at beat of a rebel drum to rush out and intercept the yeomanry as they hurried to their rendezvons. The mail coaches were all to be stopped and destroyed at a signal, the water supply of Dublin was to be cut off, the Custom House to be seized, the Castle to be stormed by men with cutlasses and pistols, who were to murder the lord-lieutenant, Lord Castlereagh, and his staff. There was no time to be lost. Every dingy yard and city garden was full of hidden arms. The yeomanry were half of them United Irishmen; the domestic servants, two-thirds spies, were preparing to murder their masters. The very lamplighters refused to light the lamps till forced at the point of the bayonet. The mountains from the Scalp in Wicklow to Mount Leinster in Wexford were bright with signal-fires, the increase or diminution of which were understood by the expectant rebels.

General Lake issued a proclamation early on the 24th, requiring all the inhabitants of Dublin except certain privileged persons to remain in their houses from nine o'clock at night till five in the morning, under pain of punishment. All persons who had registered arms were to give in an inventory, to be filed at the town clerk's office, and all persons who had not registered their arms were required to instantly deliver them up to the lord mayor or some magistrate, on pain of being sent on board the fleet without trial. Housekeepers were also required to place outside their doors a list of all tenants of the house, especially specifying strangers.

On the night of the 23d there were several partial risings. The Belfast mail was burned at Bantry, the Limerick mail was stopped on the Curragh, and the guard and coachman murdered; the Athlone coach was broken up at Lucan, and the Cork mail destroyed at Naas. At Rathfarnham, Lucan, Lusk, Collon, and Baltinglas, the rebels and yeomanry met, and in all cases the green cockades were repulsed. On the following day, Clane, Naas, Ballymore-Eustace, and Kilcullen were attacked. At Prosperous, a town seventeen miles from Dublin, forty men of the North Cork Militia and twenty British cavalry were surprised in their quarters, which were easily set on fire, the cellars being full of straw. The screaming victims who leaped out of the windows were received on the pikes of the shouting rebels.

Some headlong but undisciplined attacks on troops at Naas Carlow were unsuccessful. On Saturday, the 26th of May, the flames broke out in Wexford. A bonfire lighted on the hill of Corrigrua was answered by another on Boulavogue. In the latter place the rebel leader was Father Murphy, a priest who had graduated at Seville. He was the son of a small farmer, and had been educated at the hedge school at Ferns. This man, of a savage determined disposition, began by burning every Protestant house in Kilcormick, and piking all the Protestants he could seize. It was said that the soldiers had burned the house and chapel of this man, and that he had vowed vengeance.

The royalists, having dispersed a rebel camp with about three thousand men on a ridge of the Slieve Bridge Mountains, and afterwards burned two chapels and one hundred cabins, an attempt was next made to attack the rebel position on the hill of Ontart, two miles from Gorey. Colonel Foote pursuing an advantage too quickly, the rebels turned, and, incited by Father John, piked and shot the whole detachment (one hundred and five men), all but the lieutenant-colouel, a sergeant, and three privates. The garrison of Gorey at once retreating to Arklow, followed by a crowd of terrified loyalists. Father John attacked the town of Enniscorthy on the 28th.

This town is bisected by the river Slaney. The market-house, court, and the suburbs of Templeshannon and Drumgoold, are on the north side, at the foot of Vinegar Hill. It is a place of about five thousand inhabitants, and lies about twelve miles from Wexford, which is ninety-two miles from Dublin. The garrison consisted of about three hundred militia and yeomanry, and they formed on the bridge, and on Duffry-gate hill, upon the Carlow road, placing sergeants' guards in the market-house and the old castle. The rebels advanced, driving horses and cattle before them to break and distract the enemy's fire, and at the same time firing from behind the walls and hedges with steadiness and celerity. The insurgents being many of them good shots, (Wexford abounding in water-fowl), the fire was as heavy as it was well directed. Falling back on the town under shelter of a charge of cavalry, the yeomanry were now beset on every side, and were fired at from the windows. The rebels, repulsed at the bridge, forded the river, out of reach of the musketry. The inhabitants setting fire to the houses in the neighborhood of the troops, the streets were so full of smoke that they could not discern their opponents until they saw the charging pikes. The flames from either side of the street met in an arch over the yeoman's heads, singeing their hair, and burning the red plumes from their helmets and the tufts from their shakos. Making a great stand in the Market-house square, the garrison was at last compelled to retreat to Wexford. The troopers carried before them, on their horses, the old people, the sick, the wounded, the women, and the children. Many ladies, wild with horror, waded in the river Slaney with their children on their backs, and flew to the woods, where they were hunted for days after, as if they had been wolves. The Catholics of Enniscorthy, who had plied the rebels with whisky during the night, now welcomed them with screams of joy. They set fire to all the chief Protestant houses, dragging out the men and murdering them in the street before the eyes of their wives and children. By midnight, four hundred and seventy-eight houses, taverns, store-sheds, and malt-houses had been reduced to ashes. Cellars were broken open by fanatics who drank themselves mad, shouting that no heretic should be left alive in old Ireland. More than a hundred of the infantry, militia, cavalry, not reckoning the Protestant volunteers, fell in that day of street fighting; while upwards of five hundred dead rebels strewed the fords, island, and banks of the Slaney and the entrances of the town.

The next morning the Irish destroyed the church of Enniscorthy with ferocious delight. They made bonfires of the organ, the pews, the communion-table and pulpit, before the church door, and flung the Bibles and Prayers into the flames. They carried off the church bell on beams to Vinegar Hill, as an alarm-bell for the camp they were making there, and to beat the hours.

Vinegar Hill, which rises beyond the last huts of Enniscorthy, is conical, with a gradual ascent from cultivated fields, strips of pasture and potato-land, divided by deep clay ditches, hedges and loose stone walls. On the top of this crater-like cone stood the enclosed ruins of a windmill, which was used as a prison for Protestants, and as a shamble for the executioners. Good roads wound round the base of the hill, and it commanded the river Slaney. It was well chosen for guerilla troops, who could fight from wall to wall, and the fosses and trenches would be troublesome to cavalry and artillery. Father John intrenched it above and below, and on the top he placed batteries. Ten thousand peasants soon flocked to the rendezvous. A large garrison was placed in the town with an officer's guard, relieved every day from the hill. The glebe offices were used as storehouses for provisions and arms. Strong pickets, sentinels, and videttes were placed at the avenues leading to the town, and parties were sent out to bring in Protestant prisoners to be piked and shot during the daily parades in the camp.

From ten to twenty priests attended the insurgents, each of whom daily said mass at the head of his own column, and read the roll call of his own parishioners, exhorting them to extirpate heresy. Commissaries, each with his retinue of pikemen, levied provisions for the rebels. The farmers and neighboring gentry sent cattle, beer and wine to propitiate Father John and the other chiefs. The hill was covered with rough tents of blankets, chintz bed-curtains, tablecloths and window-curtains, part of the plunder of the town, thrown over poles bent into arches. The men slept on blankets round the fires, and, afraid of being robbed, lay on their stomachs, with their hats and shoes tied under their breasts. The camp was a scene of drunken uproar, debauchery and cruelty. While the stolen cattle were being killed and broiled in stewing-pans, some of the pikemen roasted on bayonets large pieces of meat with the hide still on, leaving the carcases to rot outside the tents. The bagpipes, fiddles and fifes played night and day; the drunken men danced while the half-starved prisoners were being shot against the windmill walls, and Father John and his brother field-officers were feasting outside their tents, under the green flag that waved on the top of the mill.

The atrocities of the rebel executions (not that yeomanry were less bloodthirsty) equalled those of the French Revolution. From thirteen to fifteen Protestants were put to death every morning, the executioners crossing themselves, and praying before they discharged their muskets. They tortured many prisoners—putting out their eyes and then starving them. They compelled Protestants to shoot each other. If a man was able to "prove himself a Christian" by saying Catholic prayers, they sometimes liberated him. Some men were buried half alive, and in one or two cases even then escaped and recovered.

About five hundred persons, men of fortune, justices, clergymen, merchants, farmers, laborers, and mechanics, perished in these massacres. Several scenes of great pathos occurred during these cruel trials in camp. On the 30th of May, William Neil, a farmer of Ballybrennen, and his two sons, Henry and Bryan, were taken to Vinegar Hill. Joseph Murphy, the leader of the pikemen, swore he would bring in no more Orangemen unless they were put to death quicker. A conference was held, and the father and two sons were of course, instantly condemned. They first led out Bryan, who begged them to shoot him, and not torture him with pikes. One of the men said he should not die so easily, and struck him on the head with an adze; as he reeled back, two others struck him with spears, and a third then shoved the rest aside and shot the man. The father was then brought forward, and, soliciting to be shot, was thrust on his knees and fired at by the executioner three times. Father Roche, who attended the execution, then ordered the man who fired to try if his piece would go off in the air. On its doing so, Father Roche liberated the farmer, imputing his escape to Divine Providence. Another of Neil's sons was burnt by the rebels in a barn, with two or three hundred other Protestant prisoners, at Scullabogue.

Another day, John Mooney, a doctor's servant, was dragged out of the mill and placed between a row of sixteen dead men. Brien, the executioner, according to custom, desired him to turn his back. Mooney refused, [illegible] he was not afraid to face a bullet; and seeing the executioner was ragged, took off his coat, his waistcoat and hat, gave them to him for his trouble, telling him to come nearer and do the business properly. The ruffian, struck with his courage, swore it was a proof of his innocence, and he would have nothing to do with him. On this, Murtagh Brien, alias Kane, a savage wretch, rose from his knees (for he was praying), and presenting his blunderbuss, insisted on shooting the heretic; but Brien interfered, threatened to blow out the brains of any man who even attempted to injure Mooney, and dismissed the prisoner.

The men in the camp used to cry out to the prisoners, "There will be soon but one religion on the face of the earth. This is the handiwork of God, for father John Murphy catches red-hot bullets in his hand. We tell you a priest can bring a lighted candle out of a pail of water." The priests also reviled them, "You sons of Belial," they said, "that withstood our holy religion, which existed eight hundred years before yours began, you will see how these pikemen will treat you unless there is a great reformation in you."

On the 14th of June, a poor woman named Hall, went to the Vinegar Hill prison to see her husband, who was shut up there. She forced her way through the rebels, and found them dragging her husband by the heels, a man with a green sash on superintending the execution. As she knelt and took the body in her arms the clouds thundered and lightened, on which the rebels fell on their knees and blessed themselves. She said, "God is angry at your act."

"No," they replied with an oath, "God is sounding the horn of joy because an Orangeman is killed." Upon this her husband, whom she had thought dead, stretched out his feet, turned to her, said faintly, "Molly, my dear, take me from these people," and expired. The body was black as if with lashes, and was pierced at the breast with a bullet. The rebels refused to let her take the body, and said, if she was fond of a dead husband, they would cut his body in pieces and fasten them to her. There was an old man with a scythe, who used to go round the bodies after an execution and strike on the head those who still breathed. Many were buried while still gasping. The rebels frequently pierced the bodies with swords, or dragged them with shouts round the hill. Many of the prisoners were shaved and pitch caps were placed on their heads. Some were lashed with brass wire (this mode of torture was fashionable recently in Jamaica, but it was not the negroes who used it). As the Protestants grew scarcer, the rebels used slower tortures. A favorite cruelty of theirs was to put a wedge-shaped stone in a Protestant's mouth, and then to stamp on the broader end.

Father John Murphy was a bold, light-complexioned man of about forty five. He was not very tall, but well made, strong, and agile. He was very passionate, and when in a rage was savage as a mad tiger. He wore pistols in a cross-belt over his vestment, and carried a pix, oil for extreme unction, and a crucifix in his pocket. Thomas Dixon, another Wexford chieftain, was the son of a publican, who had first been a tanner and then the master of a merchant vessel. His wife was even more savage and relentless than himself. There were also gentlemen among the rebel generals. John Colclough was an amiable and excellent man, who protested against all excesses. Mr. Grogan, of Johnstown Castle, another chief, was an old infirm man, who had been three times high sheriff. The rebel governor of Wexford, Keogh, was a half-pay captain, who had served with credit in America. Another leader, who bitterly repented having joined so bloodthirsty a set of patriots, was Beauchamp Bagnal Harvey, of Bargay Castle, an eccentric and good-natured barrister—thin, shambling, short, with features cramped with the small pox, and a gay tremulous voice. Father Clinch, another of the priests most active in urging on the troops and in selling them scapulars to protect from lead and steel, was a burly man, of huge stature, who rode a large white horse, and wore a scimetar, with a broad cross-belt, and a pair of long horse-pistols.

While the camp was being organized, and Vinegar Hill was being soaked with Protestant blood, Wexford had been seized by the insurgents, and a provincial government established. The rebels had already shown a desire to imitate the French Jacobins by dancing round a tree of liberty at Enniscorthy, by openly comparing two of their leaders to Santerre and Marat, and by singing semi-French songs with the chorus of "Viva-la." The chief Wexford Protestants were seized, and thrust into a sloop in the harbor, the town jail, and the market-house, Murder soon commenced.

On the morning of the 19th of June, Thomas Dixon, the rebel captain, rode to the jail door, and swore loudly that by sunset not a prisoner should be left alive, nor a soul left to tell the tale. Soon after the town bell rang, and the drums beat to arms to assemble the pikemen who were to march to the Three Rocks against General Morris' brigade. That same evening Dixon assembled his men, and hoisting a black flag, which had on one side a large blood-red cross, and on the other the initials M. W. S. ("Murder Without Sin"), signifying it was no sin to murder a Protestant, led the prisoners to the bridge where they were to be executed. Each batch was preceded by a black flag, some drummers and fifers, and was escorted by a strong guard of pikemen. The mob consisted of more women than men, and they shouted at the death of each victim. The usual manner of putting them to death was this: Two rebels pushed their pikes into the prisoner's breast, and two into his back. They then lifted him up writhing with torture, held him suspended till he died, and then threw him over the parapet into the water. Some Protestants, however, saved themselves by going through Roman Catholic ceremonies or repeating the Ave Maria.

While the massacre was proceeding, a rebel captain besought the popish bishop, who was calmly sipping his wine after dinner, to save the prisoners. The bishop replied that it was no affair of his—the people must be gratified, and requested the captain to sit down and take a glass of wine. The captain, however, indignantly refused, and took his leave. When about ninety-seven victim had already suffered, Roche came galloping into town and ordered the drums to beat to arms, as Vinegar Hill was nearly surrounded by the king's troops, and every man was wanted in the camp. At this very moment the bridge was drenched with blood, and blood was streaming down the pikes of the four executioners, who had a man aloft struggling on their spears. When the ill news arrived, the assassins hurried off, leaving three prisoners to be led back to the jail. Dixon, returning, ordered more Protestants from the jail, prison-ship and market-house to be murdered in batches from ten to twenty. Six Protestants out of ten had been impaled, when Father Corrin came running up to save the residue. Finding all his arguments useless, the priest at length took off his hat, and desired the murderers to kneel down with him and pray for the souls of the poor prisoners before they put them to death. Having got them in this attitude, he said:

"Now pray to God to have mercy on your own souls, and teach you to show that kindness toward these men which you expect from Him in the hour of death and in the day of judgment."

He then rose and led the Protestants back to prison unopposed. The massacre ceased about eight in the evening; out of forty-eight in the market-house, only nineteen had escaped.

In the meantime, the camp on Vinegar Hill was gradually being surrounded by General lake with infantry, militia and cavalry. The mob of Shanavests, Caravats, United Irishmen, White Boys, and Peep o' Day Boys, were occupied in murdering prisoners, dancing, drilling, feasting, and praying, within sound of the big bell stolen from Enniscorthy. Father Murphy, the tigerish priest, was there in his vestments and cross-belt, and Father Clinch, the giant, on the bony white horse. There were thirteen guns, the largest a six-pounder, on the hill, and many carts full of shot. The rebels also used round stones and hard clay balls instead of iron or lead, and manufactured a rough kind of gun-powder that lost its force after a few days. Their pieces they fired with lighted sods of turf and wisps of straw.

Even at the moment that Vinegar Hill was surrounded, the rebels continued their cruelties. Flying parties were continually bringing in fresh victims to be shot, piked, or slashed with scythes outside the windmill wall; men still alive were thrown into marl pits or hurled into burning houses. Catholics shot their oldest neighbors and friends who had sought shelter in their lofts or pigsties. The houses of two gentry were attacked by night by men who, covered with feather-bed shields, drove in the doors and windows with sledge-hammers. Often the rebels were repulsed by the desperate fire kept up by Protestants driven to despair, and fighting for their wives and children. In one horrible instance a beautiful girl was shot in mere wantonness and thrown into a shallow grave, her golden hair remaining outside the earth and blowing to and fro for days, till some rebels in pity gave the mangled body a more complete interment.

The war had become a religious war. There was fear on the one side, and hatred on the other. The Protestant yeomanry plundered and burnt houses with and without reason. They flogged and shot any one they met, and often on the most unreasonable suspicions. They hung and burnt the rebels by scores whenever they had an opportunity. The Hessians in particular were as cruel as mercenaries generally are. They repeated in Ireland the atrocities which had before rendered their name detestable in Scotland and in America. The volunteers were brutal, and hardly less ferocious in their cruel retaliations.

The rebels under the green flag on the windmill, little conscious how soon and with what terrible certainty defeat was about to come down upon them, still entertained the most extravagant hopes. The leaders urged them to sweep Ireland free of heretics, and sold them Gospels to preserve them from sword and bullet, kept them blind to all sense of danger, assured them that three hundred thousand pikemen would soon beleaguer Dublin, and that twenty thousand French blue coats were on the point of landing at Bantry to drive out the English, and plant the green flag on Dublin Castle. Father Murphy was to lere them to glory; Father Roche was to shout "Erin-go-bragh" at the lord-lieutenant's table; Garret Byrne and his men were to camp in the Phœnix Park and swing General Lake on the highest gibbet. Father Clinch would catch the Protestant bullets in his hand, and give them to the boys to pepper the red-coats with. Viva-la! No more singing "Croppies lie down" in heretic barracks; no more roaring "Boyne Water" at fox-hunting dinners. It was death or liberty now; Ireland for the Irish, and the heretics to their own hot quarters. Not a soul with the "black drop" in him should remain alive. So yelled the half-naked thousands in the windmill camp outside Enniscorthy.

Meanwhile, and with terrible precision, the Ninth Dragoons and Hompesch's Aussays closed round the swarming ant-hill. On the one side were half-naked, hairy-chested, yelling peasants, with scythes, hay-knives, scrapers, currying knives, adzes, old rusty bayonets fixed on poles, or spears sharpened into swords, and armed with hook; on the other, the stiff, firm Fencibles, the militia, and the stout, clumsy yeomanry cavalry, moving like automatons with mathematical accuracy, sabres in a line, pig-tails in a row, cartouche-boxes level as a die. The rebels had muskets, and could skirmish, and détour, and extend, and contract their lines; but they could not fire volleys, and, being ignorant of artillery practice, they could neither point their light guns with accuracy, nor keep up a steady, continuous fusillade. Their artillery-men were generally prisoners not to be depended upon, and they had taken no care to drill themselves or to preserve discipline. They were furious in the attack, and, like most of the Celtic races, despondiug after repulse. At bay, behind stone walls and hedges, in defiles, or on the mountain-side, they were dangerous; but even against a single brigade of a regular army they were no more to be dreaded than a mob of mischievous boys. Crowded in masses of thousands, with no great mind to direct them or to inspire them with confidence, with no real leader, and scattered into separate detachments, they could neither attack with success nor rally when broken. Not the horsewhip of Father Murphy nor the pistol-shots of Father Clinch could reduce to order those once-routed masses in the huge frieze great-coats.

On the 16th of June, General Lake resolved to relieve Wexford and Enniscorthy, and rescue the royalist prisoners. Preparations were duly made, and the columns of attack reported themselves on the evening of the 20th as in readiness for the advance at daybreak. Two brigades were, however, missing—General Moore's (subsequently the hero of Corunna) and General Needham's. On his march to Taghena, Moore had been attacked near Foulkes' Mill, had driven back the rebels who assailed his cannon at a bridge, and followed them into Wexford. As for Needham, fearful of surprise in the deep covered ways, and embarrassed with four hundred carts full of military supplies, he arrived too late to join in the attack on the hill; which could not be delayed, as the rebels threatened to send reinforcements to Enniscorthy, which was being stormed by Johnson's brigade.

About seven o'clock on the 21st of June the great bell of the windmill beat out its alarm. Sir James Duff and the red-coats were advancing by the Ferns road, General Johnson having reported his arrival on the opposite side of the Slaney near Enniscorthy. General Loftus and his light infantry supported either flank of Duff's brigade as he advanced up the hill under a shower of howitzers. The men in the frieze coats grasped their pikes and muskets, and waited grimly behind their brass guns and the high clay banks round the windmill; along the southeast ridge of the hill the rebels yelled and beat their drums. Many of them wore the brass-plated and red-tufted shakos and the hemlets of murdered yeomanry and militia. General Loftus then took a narrow road to the left, diverging from the main one, and occupied a green knoll in a small field enclosed with stone walls. He rapidly broke gaps in the wall, the artillerymen, unlimbering the guns from the horses, lifted them over one by one, and opened fire on the lower ranks of the enemy—a double forest of pikes—mowing down nearly a hundred with the first shower of grape-shot. At the same time, with colors flying and drums beating, Generals Lake, Dundas, and Wilford, flanked by Colonel Campbell's light infantry, charged up the hill on the southeast side, while Jonhson's brigade mounted from Enniscorthy, bayonets gleaming and plumes in a line.

In vain Father Murphy's horsewhip and Father Clinch's brandished scimitar; in vain priestly hands waving to heaven with crucifix and breviary; in vain consecrated scapular and endless benedictions. The cannon flashed out fitfully, but could not stop the swarming redcoats. Pikemen lined the hedges and walls one after the other with the true Irish courage, and fought from dyke to dyke. The fire was hot and fast, and the rebels fought with despair till they fell dead in the trenches, or were thrust back with bayonets over the broken walls. The agile barefooted striplings leaped and ran faster than the cavalry horses, and were so tenacious of life that the soldiers swore they withstood bullets through the lungs, and cutting their heads off only half killed them.

The night before General Johnson had been attacked by the rebels, who had advanced in close columns from Enniscorthy covered by swarms of sharpshooters, and had driven them back to the supporting columns which had halted on an eminence where the general commanded them. The peasants were astonished at the shells, and much terrified at the scattering fragments and the carnage they had occasioned. "They spit fire on us," they cried. "We can stand anything but those guns that fire twice" Whenever the round-shot plunged into the face of the hill, the rebels scrambled for them, shouting and laughing. At last a shell from a howitzer dropped, and fifty of these frieze coats were fighting for it, when it burst and scattered death among them.

This was the night before the general attack. At daybreak, Johnson forced the rebels from the height, hedge by hedge, back into Enniscorthy. After halting an hour, to allow the attack on the hill to employ the main body of the enemy, the general pushed his columns into the town. The rebels made a stubborn resistance, the pikemen fighting for every street, and the fire being hot from every window; every yard and alley was contended for. One rush of pikemen captured a six-pounder in the square before the court house, but it was instantly retaken, and the bridge swept of the rebels. The light infantry hesitating to scale the hill, Johnson called on the County of Dublin regiment to do the work, on which they gave three cheers, and, led on by Colonel Vesey and Lord Blaney, pressed up the steep hill-side, reaching it as the other columns crowned it, and pushed the great scattered host of grey-coats back headlong over the brow.

The day was lost to Father Murphy's Army. The men with the talisman scapulars were falling by twenties under the sabre and the bayonet; wigs, pikes, swords, muskets, battered hats, and torn great-coats strewed the hill. The great host had melted in a thaw of terror. The rebels were in full retreat down the section of the hill left open by Needham's absence. Pistols were flashing at fugitives, along miles of country road, bleeding men were crawling over bog and fen to die in lone corners, under stone walls, and in bramble coverts. The green flag was down at last from the windmill. The great bell was dinted with cannon-balls.

As for Father Clinch, on the big white horse, the Earl of Roden chased him for a mile, received his fire, and then shot him in the neck. An officer riding up, gave the giant priest the coup de grace. He had his vestments in his pocket, besides forty guineas, a gold watch, and a snuff-box.

Soon after this rout, Bagnal Harvey and many other rebel leaders were hung, and Father John Murphy was taken prisoner at an alehouse. When he was brought before the general's aide-de-camp, he struck a fierce blow with his fist at Major Hall, who had irritated him by some question. In his pocket was found some letters from Wexford ladies, begging him to save the lives of their husbands and relations. He was hanged the same day, his head fixed on the market-house at Tullow, and his body burned.

Three of the chief leaders were gibbeted on Vinegar Hill, near the windmill. Their bodies were, from feelings of compassion, hidden in large pitched sacks. The rebellion was now all but stamped out. In August, General Humbert and twelve hundred French landed at Castlebar, but they were driven to surrender at Ballinamuck. From that time the rebels became mere wandering thieves, hunted down, and burnt out wherever they could be met in arms.

So ended the unhappy and useless rebellion, which cost several thousand lives, and left the Irish less free than it had found them.

Persons who had opportunities of watching this disastrous outbreak have left on record one or two deductions which are not uninteresting. It was found that the village bullies, famous for their prowess with the shillelagh, were by no means in the front ranks in the various engagements, while the quiet, steady men distinguished themselves by great bravery. It was also noticed that while the fanatic and stricter Catholics were often cruel, treacherous, and unrelenting, the rakes and drunken scapegraces were frequently generous and merciful. Of the two thousand Irish priests, it should in justice be mentioned that less than twenty figured as leaders in the rebel camps, and that, in spite of all the cruelties and atrocities, outrages on women were very rare during the whole rebellion. —All The Year Round.

Geo. P. Kimball & Co.—This old established firm, so celebrated for the excellence of their Carriages, Buggies, Stage and Thoroughbrace Wagons, have recently introduced a new style of "Woodspring Buggies" in connection with steel center axles which are great improvements. Capt. Ogdon, one of the firm, took it on to New York and Brewster, on seeing it, pronounced it superior to anything ever made. Kimball & Co. are turning out an unusual amount of work, and their extensive establishment on Market street they have [illegible] large workshop on Howard street near Fifth, from which they have just shipped for the interior, [illegible] express wagons contracted for Wells, Fargo & Co.

Hose Carts for Sale.—Abbot Folsom has at his Carriage and Wagon manufacturing establishment, 521 California street, two new two wheel Hose carts, capable of carrying from five to six hundred feet of hose, for sale at most reasonable figures. These carts were contracted by the old Fire Department previous to the change to the present, and by the introduction of Hose, Hose carts, [illegible] Folsom would suggest to those of the interior towns need one or two light, strong-built Hose carts?

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

JAPANESE CIVILIZATION.

A WRITER in a recent number of "Blackwood's Magazine," presents some of the facts in regard to the social, industrial, and moral progress of the Japanese, together with certain comments upon and inferences from said facts, which are well calculated to startle the ordinary reader. Tried by the practical tests which most readily suggest themselves, when the question of the excellence of the institutions of a nation, or of a particular phase of civilization arises, Japan is to-day, in the opinion of the writer in "Blackwood," in advance of England or the United States. The general prosperity and contentment of the people, and the enjoyment by the masses of the necessaries and most of the comforts of life, notwithstanding the dense population of the island are certainly phenomena well worthy the attention of political economists, though we are inclined to doubt whether they are to be explained by the Japanese system of government, or the code of ethics which prevails amongst the people. We subjoin a few excerpts from the article:

JAPANESE DREAD OF FOREIGNERS.

"The consternation excited through the length and breadth of Japan by the visit of Commodore Perry in 1853, may be likened to that which occurs when the unwary traveler brushes over an ant's nest with his foot. The instantaneous impulse was to resist the intruders. Deeply rooted in the mind of every Japanese was the well-founded apprehension that the introduction of the foreigner was synonymous with the introduction of a train of ills from which Japan was free, and was, in fact, the inauguration of a reign of confusion, anarchy, and ruin. It is needless now to revert to the bitter experience of the latter part of the sixteenth century, when the most fearful affliction which ever befell a country was suffered by Japan, and the extermination of hundreds of thousands of the inhabitants under every species of torture was the consequence of listening with a too confiding ear to the blandishments of those early Jesuit fathers, whose success has been chronicled in triumphant tones by the ecclesiastical writers of the day—a success but transient, and purchased at the expense of the lives of all their converts, without a single exception. No wonder that three centuries had failed to heal the scar or to blot out the remembrance of this fearful tragedy from the minds of a race which had been its victims. Every man was familiar with the law which had been passed to prevent its recurrence, and which prohibited, in the most solemn and precise terms, the foreigner from ever again setting foot in the country. Time had, moreover, served to invest the idea of foreigner with all that was degraded, intriguing and superstitious. All that was known of him was, that he believed in a religion which stimulated him to the pursuit of wealth by means the most unscrupulous; and those who were not open traders and hucksters were regarded as political intriguers under the garb of ecclesiastics. Japanese experience of the foreigner, either in commerce or in religion, was that he cheated in the one and lied in the other: and they considered that any means were permissible by which so immoral an individual could be kept from entering the country and degrading the community. In order thoroughly to understand the motives which have prompted the Japanese to the acts of violence we are about to record, it is necessary to remember the great cause they had for distrusting the foreigner; and to bear in mind that they regarded him as we should regard a snake, or any other noxious reptile which mankind has good cause to dread, and is consequently justified in destroying. The news, therefore, that Commodore Perry and his squadron had been communicated with, that their proposals had been listened to, and that he was to return and make arrangements for providing a harbor of refuge for shipwrecked whalers, was followed almost immediately by the death of the Tycoon who had been guilty of the weakness of such a concession."

THE ANTICIPATED CONSEQUENCES OF FOREIGN INTERFERENCE.

"Already many Japanese, who have examined the consequences of European interference, foresee with dismay that the inevitable result of this wholesale introduction of the foreign element into their domestic affairs will lead to the most fatal disasters; and those who knew Japan as it was, must sympathise in the horror with which all patriotic Japanese contemplate the prospect of their once happy and contented land, being first desolated by internal wars, and at last reduced to the demoralised condition of a so-called civilised nation. Here is a country which crushed out Catholicism three centuries ago, and has managed to keep itself tolerably free from the contaminating influences of Western civilisation ever since. With the exception of the Portuguese Jesuits, who tried to fillibuster the country, and a few Dutchmen who purchased their right to trade by trampling on the Cross, the Japanese have not seen any Christians till lately. Hence the lust of gain and of power is inseparably connected with Christianity, in the mind of a Japanese; they conceive it to be a religious system devoted to the worship of gold and of territory, one which justifies the bombarding of towns for gold, and which teaches that the most successful trader is the most devout worshipper of this god. One of the fundamental principles of the Confucianism which they study, and strive literally to act upon, is almost identical with the saying, 'that the love of money is the root of all evil'—apparently disbelieved in by civilised nations, but considered absolutely true by them. 'Hence no matter how great the revenues of any principality may be, they are never spent by the prince upon himself. His diet consists simply of rice and fish; gluttony god his belly is indeed despised. Let us hope that through is considered a contemptible sin, and the man who makes his the French Treaty they will be cured of this notion, and perceive that it is a mark of civilisation to bestow much thought on food, and to relish especially what no Japanese would at present touch—the livers of diseased geese, and birds bordering on putrefaction. When the ladies of Japan know a little more of their Parisian sisters, they will learn to show more of the shoulders they now so carefully conceal, and consider more lightly the virtue of chastity, to which, in their pagan ignorance, they at present attach a very high importance; for the moral condition of the classes of society in Japan is not what those who have only visited certain quarters in their big cities have reported it to be."

GETTING CIVILISED.

Horse racing, betting, etc., have already been introduced, and other features of European civilisation will doubtless follow in due time. The writer says:

"With the introduction of railways we shall introduce 'boards' and 'directions.' The mysteries of finance companies, and the advantages of a stock exchange, will be duly appreciated by so quick a race, and it is not impossible that we may so far enlighten the mind of Prince Satsuma, as to induce him to become the chairman of a hotel company, or the part proprietor of a music-hall. It is a hopeful symptom of the readiness with which this skillful people adopt the appliances of modern civilisation, that in Nagrasaki and Yokohama the manufacture of Western false weights and measures is said to be progressing satisfactorily; while modes of adulterating food, formerly unsuspected by them, are being rapidly and extensively introduce by some of our most experienced adulterators. It is only to be expected that, with the spread of our commercial relations, they will acquire from us new and more scientific methods of fraud, and before long we may anticipate with pleasure the first Japanese bankruptcy. This is a commercial novelty which cannot fail deeply to impress a people who have been limited all their lives to the narrow teachings of Confucian morality. Although Yedo is a city nearly as large as London, except a few religious mendicants, there is scarcely a beggar to be seen. It is anticipated that the complete financial revolution which the introduction of the Western commercial system will produce, may largely increase this portion of the population, and enable the Japanese Government to adopt our admirable workhouse system, with all the incidental advantages of 'guardians,' a 'poor-law board,' etc., at present unknown to them; and the Prince of Satsuma, when he understands political economy, will never again be so absurd as to have the whole infant population of his principality vaccinated at his own private expense, as he did the other day. He will also see that in highly civilised communities, a free system of national education is not considered necessary, one of the benighted delusions under which he is now laboring; and he will probably abolish the free schools devoted to the inculcation of the moral precepts of Confucius. In fact, Confucius himself will, before long, be found out to be an impostor, and the great principle of self-sacrifice, which lies at the root of Japanese public and private morality, will be perceived to be a delusion and a snare. The Japanese will no longer put his duty to the race of defunct Likados first, and his country second, and his Prince third, and himself last, as at present; for he will hear from the professing Christians with whom he associates, the only principle they know of is, 'to look after number one;' and so, what with contact with the flippant Frenchman, and the vulgar Englishman, and the smart Yankee, the Japanese will be cured of those sentiments of patriotic fanaticism which find their development in an exaggerated form in self-immolation, and even justify political assassinations; but he will also be cured of all those heroic qualities which contrast so favorably with any possessed by those with whom he has recently come in contact. He will lose that simplicity which enables him to believe profoundly in great principles, which knows not the meaning of compromise, and which prompts him to throw away his life without a thought in the discharge of what he believes to be his duty."

JAPANESE ESTIMATE OF CHRISTIANITY.

"And seeing that our own political and social system can only be regarded as a gigantic failure, as compared with the Japanese, if, in the words of the American constitution, 'the pursuit of happiness' be the test of success, it would be as well for our national vanity if we estimated our civilisation at its true value, and admitted that it is ten times more powerful, for evil than it is for good, and that perhaps the most fatal defect in it is, that it seeks to varnish over its inherent rottenness with a religious gloss which it calls Christianity, but which, as practised by those professing it, bears no resemblance to that religion, so that Japanese who are instructed for the first time in the actual moral code laid down by Christ, are penetrated with amazement. 'Why,' they exclaim, 'His teaching is actually superior to that of Confucius. We had no conception Christianity was a religion like this, but believed it to be a superstition only fit for the common people and shopkeepers, like Buddhism. Why do the people who come here not live like Christians? Is it because they are ignorant merchants who only understand superstition?' 'No,' we are compelled to reply, 'they are all the same at home.' 'Then,' they say, astonished, 'why do not your learned men follow purely the teaching of Christ as our learned men follow purely the teaching of Confucius?' Such are the questions with which the intelligent Japanese Confucian plies the Western Christian, and it is long before he is enabled so completely to overcome the prejudice which the practise of Christians excites in his mind, as thoroughly to realise that it has scarcely any relation whatever to the sublime precepts of the Divine Founder of the religion he professes. For the Japanese, as we have already said, is a man who does not know what compromise means, and it is to him astonishing that a man should say he believes one thing and practise in his daily life another. In a word, he is capable of a sublime appreciation of Christianity, if it were not for an inveterate horror which he entertains of contact with the Christian. It is doubtless owing to the purely ethical character of his own religion, that the educated Japanese has no religious bigotry as applied to dogma. He hates bad practice, but he listens with respect and toleration to any new theological opinions, and imbibes with delight the elevated principles of pure Christianity. All good Japanese are in the constant habit of prayer, and only the lower class practise ceremonial. Men are great there according to their lives, not their intellect. Thus the most eminent scholar is discredited because he gave one doubtful opinion on a point of morality."

LIBER LIBRORUM.*

This is the title of a new book which will be read with interest by all those who are interested in the religious controversies of the day. It's aim is, to establish a rational and philosophical theory of the inspiration of Scripture, in opposition to the hard and literal theory of Gaussen, and the Protestant Bibliolatrists generally. The Preface to the American edition furnishes the key note to the volume. It is as follows:

"The author of 'Liber Librorum' firmly believes and earnestly defends the Historic Reality and the Supernatural Origin of the Mosaic and Christian systems He also accepts the Incarnation, the Resurrection, and the Redemptive work of Christ, and the other important truths which these involve. In respect to all these points, his position is decisive, and strongly taken against the scepticism which is so fearfully prevalent in both England and America, in the form of an avowed rejection of these facts and truths, and of a secret misgiving that they may perhaps be outgrown, or set aside by the progress of modern thinking.

He insists also upon the supreme authority of the Scriptures in respect to all questions of religious faith, and upon their permanent and indispensible superiorty above all other books, as composed by men divinely aided and inspired. But he contends, that to assert for them any higher authority or inspiration, is to claim for them more than they claim for themselves, as well as to take a position that is both untenable and damaging to the interests of Christianity. To explain and vindicate what the author believes to be the correct view of inspiration, is one of the principal objects of this treatise. He has had the sagacity to discern, and the courage to avow, that the question of inspiration must be fairly met, and can no longer be either safely or honestly thrust aside. Dr. Arnold, of Rugby, wrote in 1835, of 'the approaches to that momentous question, which involves in it so great a shock to existing notions; the greatest, probably, that has ever been given since the discovery of the falsehood of the doctrine of the Pope's infallibility. Yet it must come, and will end, in spite of the fears and clamors of the weak and bigoted, in the higher exalting and more sure establishing of Christian truth.' The author of 'Liber Librorum' believes that the time for discussing this question has fully come, and he discusses it like a brave and honest man, by looking squarely in the face the difficulties which attend the traditional theories. He does not, however, write for those whose hereditary faith is as yet undisturbed, but for the 'reluctant sceptics' who find insuperable difficulties in accepting what they conceive to be the current views of Christianity and the Scriptures.

His leading positions may be briefly characterised by those which he opposes and rejects.

1. He opposes the 'bibliolatry' which idolizes the letter of the Scriptures as against the claims of the Scriptures themselves, and the spirit of their contents.

2. He opposes the pretensions of High Church arrogance, and the pharisaism of sensuous ritualism.

3. He rejects also the narrowness of that theological dogmatism which reads every term and phrase of its creeds and catechism between the lines of the Scriptures, and refuses to revise the traditions of schools of theology by the aid of better methods of interpretation.

It would be idle to expect that all the opinions expressed in a volume written in such a spirit, and with such aims, will or ought to satisfy every reader. Some of these opinions are given as conjectures; others are manifestly not well considered Some of the views of the writer, in respect to future retribution, will be generally set aside, as unsupported by the testimony of the Scriptures. In respect to some points the work betrays marks of haste, both in thought and composition. But its spirit is earnest, honest, and Christian. It is believed that, as a whole, it is eminently adapted to relieve the difficulties of the 'reluctant sceptic' and that it will be welcomed by all those Christian believers who, in these times of trial to their common faith, have full confidence that a frank recognition of the difficulties of their argument is the only wise method of securing for it a triumph. While the book is not, and does not claim to be, an exhaustive argument for the truth of Christianity, it has at least this merit, that it successfully defends it against the ignornance and weakness of many of its defenders.

THE STORY OF BILL TELL.

BY JOHN QUILL.

"DID you ever hear the story of William Tell?" asked Charade the Fair, looking inquiringly at the commander of the Faithful.

"Told, my life," said the Caliph, "the story of William told. It is an active verb in the past tense. But who was William?"

"Tell was his name, Oh, Prince of the Faithful, William Tell."

"Oh, pardon me," said Abou; "I thought you were going back on your grammar."

"Well, my lord," said the fair Charade, "once upon a time there was a man in Switzerland whose name was William Tell, although his friends called him Bill for short. Now Bill he lived out on the mountains in a small cottage which has no gas, nor water, nor any of the modern conveniences. And Bill's principal occupation was going a gunning with a bow and arrow. He would pursue the deer to his lair, and go it after the goat. And Bill's style, like that of the animals, was eminently chased. Now William dearly loved his country. Why, you know, he was passionately fond of it. For there was no income tax whatsomever, and no old assistant assessors were loafing around robbing him of his daily bread. So William, you see, was happy and contented, and, often stood upon the mountain brow, and bathed his forehead in the translucent sunlight, and said he didn't care a cent for any foreign land, and he wasn't going to emigrate. And William was a fine old sport, and he could shoot first rate. It was said that he could hit a bull's eye every time, and if there was any one thing that he was strong on, it was pigeon matches. Why he would beat any fellow almost at that. Yes, Bill was a man of mark, he had a wife and a boy, and the boy was his father's only pride, valued more than all the world beside; he would willingly have died sooner than have any ill betide this fair child, and so he often said, and every now and then he would bless him, and lay him down, and cry over him, as his paternal feelings became agitated, and perturbed. But it came to pass that a ruffian horde invaded the land in which William dwelt, and as he was religiously down on ruffian hordes, his soul was in arms, and eager for the fray, and so he embraced his wife, and she bid a fond good bye to her own sweet William, and he went out with misty tears blinding his manly eyes, and walked down the mountain until he came to the village where the ruffian horde had located. As he came along in front of the Baptist meeting house, he observed upon the telegraph pole a Scotch cap, and all the fellows bowing down to it just as if it was the first old wooden headed idol you might pick up in a pagan land. So Bill, with all his lofty pride in him, walked up and asked what all that tomfoolery meant. And the tavern keeper he said it was all right, that the leader of the ruffian horde was named Gessler, and as he to had meet a man just out of town, he had put his cap up on this pole so that people could bow to it instead of him. And the old rum mill man said he thought it was a cap-ital arrangement, for he was one of those fellows who will enjoy their joke even under severe pressure. But Bill, you know, he just curled his fiery lip in unutterable scorn, and burst forth into the following fine frenzy:

"Ha-a-ah!—and dust the miscreaut think I will bow to yonder emblem of tyranny? Can I so debase my nobler nature? Can I, I say? Well, I guess not. Not if I am familiar with myself, and I have an indistinct impression that I am! Ha! ha!" and he laughed a wild and bitter laugh, and passed on. No sooner had he done so than two soldiers rushed up and pointed their spears at his heart.

"Oh, go away from here," said he; "don't be a fooling around with those things, or somebody'll get hurt. Go away, I tell you, or I'll call the police. Oh, yes I will."

But the soldiers were emissaries of the tyrant Gessler, and they arrested him and put manacles upon him and gagged him, so that the free mountain eagle no looger could soar, and he said he didn't want to, either, for he was sore enough already where the chains rubbed him (for his lofty spirit never would break, and he just worked off gags and witicisms to let them see that he didn't care.)

So the next day Gessler came into town, and Tell was dragged before him, with his fetters clanking at his heels.

"Whence comest thou, base minion," said the tyrant.

"I am not minion," said the undaunted Bill, with a severe air. I'm nonpareil, for I can't be beat."

For you see, my lord, that William had been a printer, and knew all about type, and so on.

"But let that pass," said Tell, "I come from where the night-hawk swoops upon his prey, and the mountain eagle soars in the empyrean amid the eternal snows."

"Aw, shut up!" said Gessler, "you've been reading dime novels. I guess you're blowin', ain't you?"

"No, tyrant!" ejaculated Bill. "No; and however good you may be a Gessler, as a guesser, why you're a complete failure, let me remark, and I say it to your teeth."

"You cannot say it to my teeth," said the tyrant, for I haven't any. I've had them extracted with the use of gas," and he grinned a savage grin to show his toothless gums. "But what's your name, slave?"

"Slave?" said Bill, "slave! why I guess you haven't read the emancipation proclamation and Constitutional amendments, have you? Slave? Slave? Why, slavery was abolished long ago. But my name is—Tell."

"Well, why don't you?" said Gessler.

"Don't I what?" said Bill.

"Why tell," said Gessler. "I want your name."

"Pshaw!" said Bill, "my name is William Tell, tyrant,"

"Oh—ah, excuse me," said Gessler, and he thought a minute. "Tell, Tell, let me see. Bring me a dictionary." A dictionary was brought, and after passiug over all the Smiths and Robinsons, he came to the T.'s. "Tell, yes, Tell sportsman, No. 89 Mountain row. I know you, you're a good shot, ain't you?"

"I'll just bet I am," said William; "you can go all the stamps you've got on that."

"And you have an offspring, have you not?" asked the cruel Gessler.

"I have, tyrant," said Tell. "O, me child, me darling, angel boy," and Tell bent his head down and burst completely into tears."

"Bring in a tub," said the heartless tyrant. "I don't wan't the floor wet all over. I'll be too damp," and he laughed a sarcastic laugh. Then turning to William, he said: "Look here, you ought to die, without benefit of clergy, but I am a merciful man, and I'll give you a chance. If you can hit a watermelon on top your boy's head at thirty paces, you'll be released, if you can't, I will mangle you up so that your most intimate friend won't be able to recoguize your corpse."

Bill clasped his hands to his brow in anguish for a moment, and heaved his bosom with pent up emotions. Then he said, "fetch him along; I'll try it anyhow." So the boy was brought in, and would have instantly rushed into his father's arms, only he had his good clothes on and was afraid of getting them mussed. And his name was Albert, and his father asked him if he was willing to stand up and be shot at. So Al. reflected for a moment, and then he said he thought he wouldn't go in. "For," said he, "I'd pretty near as leave the old man would die anyhow, for then I can handle his lucre."

But at last he was persuaded to try it, and so the whole crowd went out into a vacant lot, and Al. stood up with an old half a dollar watermelon onto his head, and his father walked back, and loaded up with a fresh arrow, and drawed off, and took aim. Then he just let her rip, and the old arrow fizzed aloug and stuck exactly in the heart of the watermelon.

"Three cheers for Tell. Hip! hip!" cried the crowd, but Tell rushed up and embraced his boy, and cried all over his shirt front. But Al. was calm, and he said, "do you know why you came very near hitting me?"

"I give it up," said Bill.

"Well, it's because I had an—arrow escape," said his only boy. At this unexpected jocularity, William fell over in a fit, and in unbuttoning his waistcoat, three arrows, a revolver, and a butcher knife fell out.

"Wherefore hadest thou these?" asked Gessler.

"To slay thee, tyrant, had I slain me child," said William, with a wild, excited air.

"Hum-m, then there would have been two funerals, wouldn't there?" said Gessler; "which would have been cheerful for the undertakers." But Bill disdained a reply, and merely walked off with his boy; but when he got home his wife was surprised, for she thought he was dead, and she had already dressed herself in black, and began to spot another man for a husband, and Bill was so mad that he slew her, and then he went down and slew Gessler, and then he got slewed himself, while Al. he browsed around and lived a gay and eccentric life, and finally died for his country on the gallows, so everything was serene and lovely and all right, and that's all.

ANATOMICAL MUSEUM.—All who visit this instructive institution are surprised at the wouders which they behold there, and depart far wiser men than they were before t entered.

A VALUABLE MACHINE.—Among all the numerous varieties of sewing machines there is not one more popular with the ladies than the Wheeler and Wilson. Wm. M. Stoddard, at the corner of Montgomery and Sacramento streets, has purchased the Agency for this machine, and carries on the business on the most liberal terms. One of the most valuable improvements lately made in this machine is Stoddard's patent tuck marker which, while sewing one tuck, marks the line for the next, thus expediting the work. Parties having the old style Wheeler and Wilson Machines can have this improvement fitted to them at a small expense.

HORN OF PLENTY.—This is the brand of a lot of one thousand boxes of Tobacco received, and for sale, by B. C. Horn, corner Front and Clay streets. This Tobacco is superior to any heretofore offered in this market. This old established house is determined to procure the agency of the newest and most celebrated brands of Tobacco fro Old Virginia, and makes advances on favorite brands in the East. A RAILWAY ADVENTURE.

IT was five minutes past seven, P. M., by the station clock, and, consequently, within five minutes of the time at which the Dillmouth train was advertised to start. Most of the passengers had taken their seats, but some two or three were standing on the platform near the carriages, bent on having a last word with those they were about to leave behind them.

There was the usual hustle and excitement incident to the starting of a train. Reckless porters rushing about with those abominable little trucks, accompanied by a "By your leave" from the heartless porter. A distressed lady in the midst of a chaos of boxes and parcels, waiting for some one to put her and her precious accompaniments safely into the train. Lost passengers looking vainly about for the train, which is all the time staring them out of countenance. A newsboy with a villainous cracked voice. These, with the usual lot of idlers, came to see the train off, and the ticket examiners and other busy satellites of the train itself, made up a scene of unparalleled life and activity.

It was Wednesday night, and Wednesday was market-day at Middlesham. The train was therefore a heavy one, and nearly every compartment was full of passengers. It was usually five or ten minutes late in starting on the Wednesday night, owing to the extra traffic; so that I and the other occupants of the compartment in which I had taken my seat were rather astonished when, the pointer having barely marked nine minutes past on the dial, the train, without any preparatory whistle, moved off. I was under the impression that we were shunting for another carriage, for such a thing as starting before time was never known to have happened at Middlesham; but when we moved past the long platform, past the entrance-signal, and through the bridge beyond, it became apparent to us all that we really were "off."

There was a simultaneous pulling out of watches, and surprised looks passed from one to the other, and to the still open door of the carriage, as the conviction was gradually forced upon us.

"Well, if this isn't a queer move, I should like somebody to tell me what is," was the exclamation of a stout cattle-jobber, who sat in the corner opposite to me. As we were all pretty much of his opinion as to the queerness of the "move," nobody offered to tell him what was; so he sat there staring, as if he were really quite overawed by the circumstance.

Once convinced by the increasing speed of the train that we were fairly on our journey, I rose from my seat, drew in the door, which was flying back against the side of the carriage, and closed it firmly. In doing so I put my head out of the window, and looking down the train, saw the light streaming through three or four other doors which had, like my own, been left open. There had evidently been some mismanagement about the starting of the train, but as I saw two arms put to catch as many of the doors, and the others would take no harm before we came to Ackridge, which was the name of the first station we would come to, I sat down again in my corner, made myself as comfortable as possible, and prepared myself, as was my habit, to listen to the remarks of my fellow-travelers. These were four in number. The cattle-jobber I have already mentioned, his partner, and two Middlesham merchants, who lived some twelve miles, or thereabouts, down the line.

The merchants soon commenced a brisk conversation, the part of which that most interested me being the following:

First Merchant.—"Awkward thing, this strike among the engine-drivers?"

Second M.—"Well, yes. But I must confess to knowing very little about it. I merely saw the short paragraph alluding to it in this morning's news. Have you heard anything fresh about it?"

First M.—"The last I have heard of it is that the men have sent in their month's notice. They demand a considerable advance in the rate of wages, and an alteration in the system on which their earnings are calculated. A deputation of them waited upon old Rasper, the superintendent, yesterday. They stated their grievances, and the terms on which they would continue to work, and said if those terms were not acceded to by the company, they would strike. At this old Rasper jumped up from his chair, and told them that they were a lot of ungrateful dogs; that they were better paid than the drivers of almost any other line in the kingdom; that if he could possibly do without them he would discharge every mother' son of them at once; that he would settle with them when the time came, and that they might be off and get on with their work in the shops at once; and he forthwith turned every one out of his office. He'll settle with them. Ha! ha! Rasper by name, and Rasper by nature, ha! ha!

Second M.—"But this is a very alarming state of things. Is it not dreadful to think that we poor passengers are at the mercy of these malecontents, and that they have it in their power to do something horrible with us, merely to spite their employers?"

First M.—"No; I don't think there is any fear of that, for the passenger men have taken no part in the strike whatever. It is only the drivers of goods-engines who have become disaffected. The others have given the movement the cold shoulder from the first."

Second M.—"Still, these goods drivers, with their intimate knowledge of the line, must have it in their power to do an incalculable injury to their employers, and the public as well. Why, the mere placing of a sleeper, or a chair, or a piece of old iron, on the rails, would be enough to send us all off to the other world express, and without any return tickets!"

They were both laughing over this dreamy old joke of No. 2, when my attention was distracted to the cattle-jobber. He was leaning half out of the window, and shouting "Stop! stop!" at the very tip-top of his very loud voice. On our inquiring what was the matter, he replied, "Why, dang it! if we haint been and passed Yeckridge station, and me and my mate had to get out there. Here, hi! stop here, hi!" The last exclamation was in a sort of prolonged shriek, which woke the echoes as we shot into and roared through a tunnel.

"My good man," I ventured to remark, "you must be mistaken. They would never think of passing a station like Ackridge without stopping, and certainly not when they have passengers booked for it."

"Whether they sud or they sudn't, they hev dun it; why, look! there's Bowlt's smelt works, and we must be two miles on th' wrong side o' Yeckridge!" and here he relapsed into another indefinite "hi!" at the open window.

The matter all at once became very serious indeed. We were bowling along at a terrible rate, much quicker than any of us had ever experienced on any previous occasion on that line of curves and ugly gradients, and a dreadful fear began to show itself in our faces—a fear which first found expression from the gentleman I have hitherto designated the second merchant.

"It is my belief," he said, "that we are run away with."

As he said the words there was a horrible, breath-taking jumble of lamps, and walls, and clocks, and handbills, and white faces, as we dashed into and through another station, and then away—away into the black, black night beyond. After that none of us doubted that our train was a runawny, and also that it was running away to our certain destruction, and to the certain destruction of nearly every passenger in it, unless something could be done to arrest its headlong career, and that very speedily.

When the keen edge of the shock had somewhat worn off, we began to think of what chances and means there were of deliverance, and naturally, the first to suggest itself was "the guard." Yes, doubtless the guard would see the danger as we had seen it, and would endeavor to avert the awful fate which seemed now hanging over us. There was comfort in the thought; but, alas! it was very short-lived, for a glance down the train sufficed to show us that the door of the van was one of those which were still standing open. The conviction was therefore forced upon us that the guard had been left behind. He was not on the engine, or he would have stopped the train; he was not on his way to it, or we should have been able to see him by the light of the side lamps of the train; and he was not in his van, or his door would have been shut, and his brake vigorously applied long ere this, and of that there was not the slightest indication.

Ours was truly an awful position. Passanger in a runaway train, on a black and moonless night, and with neither engine-driver or guard to help us!

The Middlesham and Dillmouth railway was about twenty-two miles long, and there were four intermediate stations—Ackridge, Durton, Felton, and Ifcombe, between the two termini. Two of these stations were passed, and we had therefore run about half the distance. We had been fifteen minutes in doing one-half, and would most probably do the rest of the journey in less time than that. A miserably short time to save so many lives; but something must be done. I had already made up my mind that I would do it, and was preparing by divesting myself of whatever would impede my motions, and prevent the free use of my limbs, when the first merchant looked wonderingly at me, and asked me what I was going to do.

"I am going to try to stop the train, to save my life and all our lives." I have to confess that until that moment I had been thinking only of my own life, and had scarcely given a thought to the numerous passengers in that heavily-freighted train; but when I saw the merchant look shudderingly out into the darkness through which we were flying, and the hopeless look with which he fell back, almost sobbing, into his corner, I began to have an idea of the duty that was before me; and I nerved myself to the utmost to do it.

Hitherto I have intentionally said very little about myself, but it is now necessary to state that I was an employé of the immense railway concern, of which the Middlesham and Dillmouth was but a branch. I have used the sounding word employé, but the simple fact was that I was a relief clerk, and that I was at that very time on my way to Ifcombe to take the place of the station-master, who was then seriously ill and unable to attend to his duties. I was very often called to this particular kind of duty, and had, in consequence, acquired a very thorough and practical acquaintance with the outside work of a railway. I had had a great deal of knocking about from one place to another, and had been involved in some four or five different accidents of a more or less serious character. I had luckily escaped from them all without injury, unless I dignify with the name of injury the slight bruise which I got by being jammed in the doorway of an overturning carriage, by a gentleman who was just as anxious to be out of it as I was.

Nothing so much tends to give a man presence of mind as the being concerned in a few railway accidents. The first time he is, as it were, knocked stupid; the second time he begins to reason; but the third time he decidedly objects, and the first chance he has he is out of the train and doing his best to assist his fellow-passengers. I had exceeded this stage by, as I have said, two or three accidents, and had gained a considerable stock of presence of mind, which I was prepared to use in the present emergency.

I would try to reach the engine by walking along the platforms of the carriages. My mind had been made up to that long ago, for through my unenviable experiences of railway accidents, I had got into the unconscious habit of forming a course of action for myself for almost any eventuality which could turn up. I had besides, known of two cases of runaway trains. In both cases the steps of the carriages were used as a means of communication with the engine. In the first case successfully, but in the second, the guard was smashed against the signal-post in swinging from one door-handle to the next, and the train itself went tearing on until it came to the terminus, where it tore up the buffers, and was finally deposited in fragments about the platform and the first-class refreshment room. Fortunately, it was an empty train and late at night, so that no one was injured except the engine driver, who broke his leg in jumping from the engine, when he found he could not stop it; and the guard, who was killed. The other case was that of a train which seemed certain to come in collision with another at a level crossing. The drivers put on the engine at full speed and jumped off. Almost by a miracle there was no collision, and the train went on without any one to check it. As it happened, the guard had seen the danger, and had also seen the two men jump off the engine, so that when the crossing was safely passed, he made the best of his way along the steps of the carriages to the engine, which he reached in safety, and was able to draw up before they arrived at the next station.

This was the plan I intended to put into practice, but on looking out of the right-hand window, I was staggered to find some of the doors still flying open, and as it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to pass them at the rate we were going, it was much too hazardous to think of going that way; and the other side was equally out of the question, for, with there remembrance before me of the ill-fated guard I have mentioned, I could not have gone. There remained, therefore, nothing but the roof of the carriages. And now that I had thought of that way, I could not help wondering that I had not thought of it before. It seemed so much easier and safer to walk along the roofs, and leap from one carriage to another, than to scramble like a cat from door-handle to door-handle, and from one platform to the next. To decide, was the work of one moment—the next, I was in action. I threw the door open, and stepping, from the floor of the carriage, upon the window frame, used it as a kind of ladder, and mounted to the top. As I did so, I heard the merchant, from the corner, give me a parting "God bless you!" in a voice weak and trembling, but with an accent so sincere that I felt considerably encouraged and strengthened in my purpose. God knows I needed it, for although it was a matter of comparative ease to reach the roof, yet once there, on my first attempt to assume an upright position, I was thrown violently back, and had I not caught the end of a strap which was flying loose, I should most certainly have rolled off, and have been killed on the rails below. In my eagerness I had quite overlooked the tremendous speed at which we were traveling, and the consequent immense resistance offered by the atmosphere. The accident, however, rendered me more careful and particular in my every movement, and I immediately set myself at work, with all my faculties of mind and body in their fullest exercise, to transport myself to the fore-end of the train. I was on the fourth carriage from the engine, and there were, therefore, four horrid gaps for me to cross before I should find myself safely on its tender.

It was terrible work; and I could only get on at all by crawling along on my hands and knees, and holding on to such straps and rods as came in my way. There was an old-fashioned guard's seat on the front of each of the carriages, so that, by stepping down upon this, leaning forward, and placing my hands on the next carriage, and springing up, and so on, crawling and jumping, I at last reached the guard's seat on the first carriage, where I naturally expected I should have nothing to do but spring on to the cinders of the engine tender. In this I was, however, cruelly disappointed, for, as if to complete the chapter of accidents, I found the engine was turned the wrong way about, so that nearest me was the black and ugly chimney heaving out its rapid clouds of luminous steam and smoke. I almost gave it up then, my case looked so very hopeless; for do what I would, and stretch myself and reach out as I might, I could not touch any part of the engine with my feet. I was almost at my wit's end. The unaccustomed exertion was beginning to tell upon me severely, and I was trembling with excitement and cold. I sank despairingly into the seat. I never thought of clambering down and crossing over by the buffers, for I had so made up my mind to the one course, that, when it was interrupted, I was for a time staggered, and rendered incapable of further action. I was so sitting, with my elbows on my knees and my face buried in my hands, stupidly brooding over and cursing my adverse fate. when a blaze of light showed me the platform of Felton station. There were not many people waiting, for the train was not due for several minutes; but the scared look which I distinctly saw on the faces of those few, as we tore past, I can never forget. It may be thought impossible that, at the high rate at which we were running, I should be able to see those faces so distinctly, but it is nevertheless, quite true; and, what is more, I seemed to take in all—the people, the clock-face, the name of the station, and all the minutest etceteras—without trying to do so, or moving my head in the least, and in the smallest fraction of time, for we were in and out of the station in a flash.

What the people thought of me—if they saw me at all, on my perch—I do not know; but the sight of them on me was electrical. Intuitively I saw that no time was to be lost. In the same moment I had resolved—and done. I had sprung, and was clinging round the neck of the unconscious monster in front, and sliding rapidly down its smooth and heated surface on to the truck of the engine. Once there, all was well. I walked along the side, over the wheels, always holding on to the brass rod, and, in another moment, was moving the handle to shut off the steam previous to applying the brake. I knew enough of locomotives to prevent my doing this too quickly, and I did not draw up until we reached Ifcombe Station. Arrived there, I resigned my charge to the station-master, and, after securing the few things I had left behind me in the compartment, made my escape to the booking-office as fast as I could; for the handshaking, "God bless you's!" and other expressions of thanks from the people whom I had been instrumental in saving from a terrible catastrophe, were proving too much for me, and I was glad to get away from it. There was something so terribly earnest and sincere about it, that I was more frightened by it than I had been by any part of my perilous adventure.

Very little more need be said. A message was immediately sent to the authorities at Middlesham, apprising them of our safe arrival at Ifcombe, and requesting that an engine might be sent on with fresh drivers and our guard. The telegram reached them just as they were about to send off a special engine and carriage containing all the medical men they could collect in so short a space of time, for their impression was that we would all be found buried in the ruins of our train somewhere between Middlesham and Dillmouth. Of course, when they heard we were all right; the doctors were set at liberty, and the engine came on by itself with our guard and drivers. We then heard for the first time how the thing happened. The engine-driver, it appeared, had gone across the line to get his usual glass of whisky before starting, leaving his fireman in charge. While he was gone the fireman had to get off to do some oiling work to the engine, and some one, supposed to be one of the goods drivers, had seized the opportunity and got on. This man had called out to the fireman to stand by and hold a swich while he took on a horsebox. The fireman, thinking all was right, and that it was the proper driver returned, without looking up, did as he was told. Everything then followed as we had suspected. The train moved off without the guard, and with the carriage doors open. The engine-driver rushed up just in time to see the tail-lights of the train disappearing under the bridge, and very much surprised his fireman by asking for an explanation of such an extraordinary proceeding. The fireman, poor man, could only protest in strong language that he had received his orders from the engine, and as he supposed, from the engine-driver himself. There was, as might be expected, great consternation amongst the officials, when it became known that some one had run off with the train, and as such a thing could not have been done with any harmless intention, and the consequences would in all probability be serious, immediate steps were, as we have seen, taken to provide that assistance which, it was feared, would be needed by us. Happily, as I have shown, it was not needed, and the whole of the passengers were forwarded to their various destinations, safe, at all events, in body, if terribly disturbed in mind.

A word or two as to the man who devised and perpetrated this horrible attempt. He was supposed to have jumped off the train a little way down the line; and to have got clear away.

For the share which I had the good fortune to have in the matter, and for saving them so much valuable property, and so many thousands of pounds in claims for compensation, I received a handsome acknowledgment from the directors, and have risen rapidly from one position to another; so that, although it was long before I quite recovered from the nervous state into which I sank after the occurrence, I have had no reason to regret that I was in that runaway train, and I did my duty to the passengers, and to the company whose servant I was. I am thankful that I had sufficient courage and strength of purpose to do that duty satisfactorily.

GOOD-NIGHT!

"Good-night! a sweet voice laughing said.
And by the hope within me born,
I knew we only said good-night
To meet again at morn.

"Good-night! one time it softly said;
And by the heavy heart I bore,
I knew full well we said good-night—
Good-night for evermore.

"Ah, sweet it was to say good-night,
When morning could our joy restore;
What grief to part beneath the stars,
And meet on earth no more."

SMUGGLING DEVICES.

IN the days when high-heeled French boots were the pride of fashion, there was a shoemaker in London who made a fortune by the sale of the best Paris boots at a price which all his fellow-tradesmen declared ruinous. He undersold the trade, and obtained troops of customers. These boots must be stolen, said his rivals; but there was no evidence that they were; certainly they were not smuggled boots, for any one could satisfy himself that the full duty was paid upon them at the custom house. The shoemaker retired from business with a fortune. Afterwards his secret was accidentally discovered—although he had paid duty for the boots, he had not paid for everything that was in them. There was a heavy duty payable on foreign watches; and every boot consigned to him from Paris had contained in its high heel a cavity exactly large enough to hold a watch. The great profits obtained by the trade in smuggled watches, made it possible for this tradesman, when he had filled up their heels, to sell his boots under prime cost. This was worth while, again, because of course, by the extension of his boot-trade, he increased his power of importing watches duty-free.

Some years later, an elderly lady and a lap-dog traveled a good deal between Dover and Ostend. It came to be generally considered at the custom-house that her travels were for the sole purpose of smuggling Brussels lace, then subject to exceedingly high duty; but neither the examiners of her luggage, nor the female searchers at the custom-house who took charge of her person, could by the narrowest scrutiny find matter for a single accusation. At last, when she was about to decline the smuggling business, this lady accepted a bribe from a custom-house officer to make him master of her secret. Calling to her side the lap-dog, who was to all strangers a very snappish little cur, she asked the officer to fetch a knife and rip the little creature open. Like a few of the dogs (which have sometimes even proved to be rats) sold in the streets of London, it gloried outwardly in a false skin; and between the false skin and the true skin was space enough to provide a thin cur with the comfortable fatness proper to a lady's pet, by means of a warm padding of the finest lace. In the reign of Louis the Eighteenth—it may be noted, by the way—very fierce dogs were trained to carry valuable watches and small articles under false skins across the frontier. They were taught to know and avoid the uniform of a custom-house officer. Swift, cunning, and fierce, they were never to be taken alive, although they were sometimes pursued and shot.

Not very long ago, a great number of false bank-notes was put into circulation within the dominions of the Czar. They could only have been imported; but although the strictest search was made habitually over every vessel entering a Russian port, no smuggling of false notes was discovered. So strict is meant to be the scrutiny at Russian custom-houses, that the ship-captain, who is bound to give an inventory of every article on board, may fall into unheard of trouble if he forget so much as his own private Canary-bird. There was an English captain once at Cronstadt, who by accident, forgot to enter a fine turtle upon his list. He told the leading custom house official plainly and honestly of his unfortunate omission, and the functionary, who was a good-natured man, saw no plain way out of the difficulty. He recommended that the matter should be glossed over by assuming that the turtle was intended for the emperor. The captain did, therefore, declare that, if he had not entered the turtle, it was because it had been brought expressly as an Englishmen's gift to the Czar, and to the Czar the turtle was dispatched accordingly. Soon afterwards there arrived a government messenger inquiring for this most courteous of captains, who brought the gracious thanks of the Czar Nicholas, together with the gift of a gold snuff-box, embellished with the autocratic cipher set in diamons. Instead of fine and persecution there were gifts and honors for this lucky sailor. But when, afterwards, some other trading captains, acting, as they imagined, cunningly upon the hint, brought turtles to exchange for snuff-boxes, his astue majesty quietly made the turtles into soup, but declined by any act of exchange to add snuff-boxes to the articles of Russian trade shipped at the port of Cronstadt.

Now to go back to the forged notes. Accident brought also that mystery to light. Several cases of lead-pencils arrived one day from England, and were being examined, when one of them fell out from a package, and the custom-house officer picked it up, cut it to a point, and used it to sign the order which delivered up the cases to the consignee. He kept the one loose pencil for his own use; and a few days afterwards, because it needed a fresh point, cut it again, and found that there was no more lead. Another chip into the cedar brought him to a roll of paper nested in a hollow place. This paper was one of the false notes, engraved in London, and thus passed into the dominions of the Muscovite.

During the last epidemic fever which displayed itself in this country as a rage for antique furniture, much of this was imported from the Netherlands. A shrewd Dutch tradesman very much preferred an order for sofas and chairs to an order for sideboards or tables. Horsehair, he knew, was plentiful enough in England; the duty upon tea, however, was excessive; and by an arrangement entered into with his English agent, it was understood that tea should be used, instead of hay or horsehair, as the stuffing of all cushions attached to furniture transmitted by his house. In this way there was a fortune made.

"THE GENIAL CRITIC."

THE New York Nation recently published an article with the above title, which was designed as a reply to the remonstrances that had been urged in certain quarters against the severity of the book reviews of that journal and the austerity of its literary judgments in general. If "genial criticism" is, as the Nation characterizes it, "praise, with just enough faint censure in it to make it seem that the writer is really balancing defects against excellencies," then, indeed, it is not a kind of criticism to be defended, but we are inclined to believe that the element in the Nation that has caused complaint, is not so much the severe standard by which it measures literary performances, as the cold, and sometimes unfeeling, manner in which its verdicts have occasionally been rendered. Take the case of poor George Arnold, for instance. The Nation might have expressed substantially the same opinion that it did express in regard to the merits of his poems, without giving offence, had it been content to pronounce judgment in a judicial tone, and without the use of language that not only implied contempt of the recently deceased writer's powers, but that sounded like a sneer at his literary aspirations. It will not be claimed that the Saturday Review is much addicted to "genial criticism" in the sense of easy indulgence to pretenders in letters, and yet that exacting journal found something for cordial praise in the volume which the Nation appeared to think it astonishing that the author's friends should have dreamed of publishing. When we first saw that unnecessarily cruel notice, we attributed it, not to anything like malice, or to any discreditable motive, but to the natural reaction against the spirit of puffery, in a journal aiming to be critical, and rather overdoing it.

What the Nation says in regard to the position of the critic with reference to the bookseller on the one hand, and the public on the other, shows clearly the necessity of strict honesty and fearlessness in the opinions pronounced upon new books by literary journals, but it does not show the necessity for that supercilious and offensive manner in pronouncing unfavorable verdicts to which the higher class of our critical periodicals are too much addicted. It seems sometimes, as though they assumed a harshly authoritative air, as a proof of superiority, or to conceal some half unconscious doubt of the soundness of their own conclusions. The fear of seeming weakly indulgent, at times makes them cruel; the fear of seeming provincial drives them into an exaggerated affectation of metropolitanism. We can see no reason, why the keenest and most analytical criticism should not be kindly in its spirit, when dealing with questions of mere literary excellence, not involving moral considerations. Perhaps the best conception of the really useful critic is, as a loving and intelligent interpreter of genius; his most important function is not to correct the writer, but to assist and enlighten the taste of the reader; to draw the attention to beauties rather than to point out defects; to awaken an intelligent admiration for what is truly admirable, rather than to teach men how to sneer at unsuccessful performances. To call the mere fault finder, who goes mousing through a literary work on the scent for blemishes, counting syllables and exulting over defective rhymes, broken metaphors, or bad syntax "a critic" seems to us a sheer profanation of a useful and dignified office. To teach men to seek and appreciate what is wholesome in literature is the most important part of his duty; subordinate and incidential to this, is the duty of exposing literary pretenders when there is danger of their depraving the popular taste, or exerting a mischievous influence. If one who judges and writes in accordance with these principles falls under the classification of the "genial critic," it is to be wished that the number of such were greater than it is.

FENIAN PICNIC.—The last Fenian Picnic was thoroughly enjoyed by the thousands who participated in it. The Second Grand Annual Picnic of the Brotherhood will take place at Bay View, Marin County, opposite Angel Island, to-morrow. Three steamers, the Petaluma, Contra Costa and Goliah have been engaged. The first boat, on which the Irish Battalion will go, starts at 9 o'clock: the McMahon Guards will leave on the 10 o'clock boat. Two large covered dancing platforms have been erected. Kidd's fine band of thirty pieces have been engaged, and everything done which can conduce to the comfort of visitors. The steamers will make four trips to and from the grounds. The hours of departure and return can be found in their advertisement.

CALIFORNIA LITERATURE.

THE amount of disquisition, criticism, boasting, and squabbling that we have had on the subject of "California Literature," is such as to impart a ludicrous significance to that ambitious phrase, when we come seriously to consider the productions to which it is applied. A very small number of volumes of moderate physical dimensions would easily contain in the largest type employed in book-making and with the most elegant amplitude of margin, all those productions that rise above the standard of the average contributions to the literary journals, or that could find a plausible apology for appearing in a book form. Of what does this "literature" consist? If called upon to reply to this question, we could name but one good novel—Mrs. Hosmer's "Morrisons"—and that, in no just sense, Californian; a score or so of poems, not more than half a dozen of which are sufficiently striking or characteristic to prompt an inquiry as to their authorship were they found in one of the magazines of the day; the sketches of Phœnix, Harte, "Mark Twain," Mulford, and Webb—if, indeed, the last named gentleman can be properly reckoned for any purpose, among Californian writers—these, with Mr. Tuttle's "History" and Mr. Hittell's "Resources," would pretty nearly exhaust the catalogue.

So far as the "Poetry of California," about which literary persons of the "Gifted Hopkins" calibre have made such a pother, is concerned, it really posseses, as a whole, very little intrinsic or positive value. It is not distinctive, it possesses no strongly marked character, and with a very few exceptions is characterized by a disheartening absence of originality or creative power. The three or four most accomplished of our living minstrels have thus far done little else than pipe variations upon familiar tunes, their best productions being in the imitative strain into which men and women of culture, taste and poetic feeling, but without poetic power are sure to fall when they take to writing verses. With almost all of them, the keen appreciation of some admired master or model has been the source of their inspiration, and it is generally an easy task to discern in each case to what master the pupil pays his or her reverent homage. These remarks, however, are not limited in their application to Californian verse-writers; they are true of American poets generally, who, with three or four exceptions are merely graceful imitators, their best pieces being echoes of Tennyson, as he seems to hint (though without special reference to American writers) when he says:

"Most can raise the flowers now,
For all have got the seed;
And some are pretty enough,
And some are poor indeed."

This incessant reproduction of "variations" of the same tune, inevitably becomes wearysome at last, a fact which was in the consciousness of the English laureate when he added to the lines just quoted:

"And now again the people
Call it but a weed."

Altogether the most valuable, as well as the most distinctive and truly "Californian" part of our literature thus far, consists of the humorous sketches of the writers we have named. Of these, Harte's are much the finest as literary performances, though less strongly marked by individuality than those of Pœnix, "Mark Twain," and others. We cannot now recall anything of his—we refer to his prose—that bears any intrinsic evidence, beyond some merely unessential local allusion, that it was written in San Francisco rather than in New York or Boston, while such sketches as the "Jumping Frog," and Mulford's "Barney McBriar, the Shootist" are thoroughly and unmistakably Californian.

The literary task, however, by which a wider and more durable reputation than has yet been achieved by any of our writers is to be won, is the production of a genuine Californian novel, a novel that shall adequately paurtray all that is distructive and significant in a social condition that is rapidly passing away and will soon become unintelligible, unless it shall find a chronicler more competent than any who have yet entered the field.

DEATH OF HENRY C. WATSON.—While the ear is thrilled and the senses enraptured with melody, the personality of the performer is perhaps entirely ignored. After the strain has ceased there comes a sense of loss. A few may bestow a passing thought upon the mind which has embodied this conception, but the many with souls enriched, turn away without a feeling of gratitude or remembrance for the giver. So with many a writer whose masterly and skillful manipulation attunes in unison the chords of the great heart of humanity. The personality, or any feeling of curiosity regarding it is often ignored or neglected in the strength of the emotions given to the world, and although appreciation, which, when fairly won, is always welcome, may be felt, it is often too little expressed.

To a certain extent, these facts apply to Henry C. Watson, editor of the Sacramento Union, whose death occurred during the last week. Combining in himself, originality and ability as a writer, with the executive power necessary to successful editorial management, Mr. Watson made the Union one of the most influential journals, not only on this coast, but of the United States. He has perished while gallantly fighting on that comparatively unknown and unappreciated field where the conflict is so arduous and exhausting to body and soul. But his works, though not all known of men, still remain, and now to his soul as he surveys them, afford a prospect grand and beautiful in that better land, where cheered, strengthened and encouraged by appreciation and sympathy, he will bring forth more and more beautiful treasures of intellect. PHILOSOPHICAL AND DISCURSIVE VIEW OF THE RECENT RATIFICATION MEETING.

BY DOGBERRY.

THESE reflections concerning the recent ratification meeting at Union Hall, must be read in an unpartisan and unprejudiced light. The reader will endeavor to be cosmopolitan and just. If he never happened to be either, he had better try; it's good practice.

While I sat and looked over the vast array of human beings gathered together last Tuesday evening, I thought thus: "These people have come together to hear somebody who has something to say, say it. They are willing to be uncomfortable for several hours, to endure the closeness of the hall, the weariness of enforced sedentary position, the proximity of disagreable neighbors, the thought, perhaps, of families and infants left with uncertain protection, and all for what? Why, to learn how the country must be saved, to have the glorious stars and stripes apostrophized, traitors and copperheads denounced, and to hear another short history of the Great Rebellion from speakers who, on arising, will declare 'that the other distinguished orators preceding, having completely exhausted the subject, they have nothing to say,' and then proceed to give a practical lie to the declaration by talking for an hour."

Being a reporter, I had the privilege of a position which enabled me to gaze with that sublime, philosophical and condescending calmness over the audience becoming to a "member of the press."

You see, we take all these "immense demonstrations," "intense excitements," "enthusiasms," and "electrifications" very quietly. It is to us an every day affair. We are about as liable to become enthusiastic or excited as the chairs we set on. Some half hour before the meeting commences, while people are dropping in like the preparatory drops of an April shower, we spread our paper, sharpen our pencils and travel over a well worn road of imagination, thus: "The meeting at — Hall last evening, was attended by an immense concourse of intelligent ladies and gentlemen, and was the most enthusiastic demonstration which has ever before occurred in this city." Then we shove in a line or so about the 'fair sex," "fair women and brave men," "faces beaming with hope and patriotism," and the reportorial gun is primed and all ready to go off when the speakers do.

The audience at Union Hall last Tuesday evening was not arranged at all to my liking. There is in every assemblage a proportion of majestic, portly, imposing men with leonine features and canes. There are also the venerable, gray-haired men with canes. These should always be distributed in equal proportions among the crowd to whom nature has not been so liberal in prepossessing and imposing exteriors. Such an arrangement confers dignity on the meeting and is encouraging to the orators. There should also be a similar disposition of the apparently philosophical, thinking men. Nature, you know, has compensated some people for the entire lack of such qualities by plastering their faces with an enamel of wisdom an inch deep, although the interior may be devoid of the tail of an idea. As I was saying, these people whose mission it is to "touch up" audiences were all daubed and jumbled together.

Directly in front of me sat three of the majestic, imposing men with canes. I desired greatly to distribute them properly; to rush up to them saying, "Here! get out of this. Go where your mission calls you. You sit over in that corner yonder. There ain't an ounce of dignity there. You go over there. We want some majesty in that part of the hall. I s'pose you sat together that you might grab all the praise and pocket it when the speakers adverted to this intelligent and imposing assemblage. Do you chaps think you're going to huddle together and bury your talents in this manner?"

Owing to the great want of harmony in the world I was unable to do this. I was obliged to sit and endure the botched up picture.

The first symptoms of vitality evinced by the ratification meeting was the sight of a number of horns, trombones and other brass instruments, with the necessary individuals attached to them; and next the sound of the same harmonized into a patriotic air as the human fixtures to the instruments blew through them. It has long been a doubtful question with me whether in the execution of an air the greater credit should be given to the lips and lungs disciplined to harmony or to the instrument. I regarded with curiosity one of the band as he tooted through several pounds of brass so twisted up as to remind one of a fit of colic. That cold blooded and mercenary child of Orphens plays Yankee Doodle and the Star Spangled Banner alike for Democrat, or Republican. He has no heart in the matter. His heart is in the instrument, and the instrument is brass.

Next the human ornamentations of the platform made their appearance. It was interesting to watch the different styles of gait and facial expressions of these gentlemen as they made their appearance. It is not such a pleasant matter to walk easily, graceful and indifferently across an elevated platform in full view of an immense, waiting, idle and therefore critically inclined assemblage. Some immediately on facing the music were seized with a sort of pedal weakness and tottered uneasily to their seats. Some could not control their facial muscles and smiled vacantly at each other and the audience. Others assuming a bold and daring port, strode majestically to their seats with the air of a tragedy king.

Mr. Conness was the first speaker, Mr. Conuess is in appearance decidedly senatorial. His figure is senatorial, his head is senatorial, so is his voice, and more than all the dress-coat he wore, of that peculiar style which has caused it in common parlance to be termed "swallow-tailed," enhanced to a remarkable degree his senatorial appearance. Mr. Conness objected decidedly to personal abuse bestowed on public men. He objected to the abuse which had been so liberally bestowed on himself.

It is hard to be abused until one travels into that country which lies beyond the reach of abuse. Roses have thorns, Cabbages do not. A United States senatorhip is a whole bouquet of roses, John, with, of course, the accompanying thorns. Yet you would rather have the bunch of roses than the bunch of cabbages with which we common people must be content, wouldn't you now, John?

Gov. Low spoke. He remarked on commencing that dis appointment would inevitably result in the expectation of hearing a speech from him. Some individual in the crowd showed a full commnnionship of opinion in this regard with the Governor by calling out "That's so." Perfect happiness on the confession of our shortcomings does not always result from immediate coincidence by sympathizing friends. The Governor remarked that "any head with brains was better than a Copperhead." I presume he meant any human head. I have some Copperhead acquaintances who, despite their abominable tenets, can be made of more use in the practical affairs of life than most animals. They might be induced to vote for a Union nominee.

Mr. Pixley spoke. Mr. Pixley's speech was the feature of the evening. It must have been efficacious in cementing the party. But I shall not speak of it in this respect. I have another axe to grind.

"Mr. Gorham," said he "has been abused for the course he had pursued in excluding the San Francisco delegates opposed to him. Why, he had done no more than I would against his members if I could. If he can control and manipulate the Legislature of the State as he managed the State Convention he will make the best Governor California ever had."

Some may think this a terrible thing to say. Mr. Gorham, in their estimatian, should have been termed the most honest, the purest, and the best of men; and one who would on no account pull a political wire. Such, too long, has been the stump orator style in the delineation of the character of public men. We are tired of it. Everybody knows better. Everybody knows they will take things sometimes when these things are jolted out of the legitimate political cart, and are found and picked up in the legitimate political road. Mr. Pixley's commendation of his friend, and declaration of what he would do were he similarly situated, is a healthy sign, and ten thousand times more creditable than if he had deluged his hearers in the counterfeit torrent of fulsome praise with which the poor, political public have been washed from time immemorial.

I shall always withhold my vote from your perfectly upright and honest men so cried from the housetops unto the people. Political honesty will mount the first step of the ladder when candidates openly come out and say—"Fellow citizens and patriots! I want office. I think I can efficiently serve you as your standard bearer. I am willing to take all the emoluments, the perquisites and the pickings of the office, and as much more as will be justified by my elastic conscience. God bless you! my fellow countrymen, God bless you!!"

The Rev. Dr. Cox spoke forcibly and with much emotion. He has much action, some very good, although the singular trot with which he moved around the platform, requires some little time before one can see the grace and dignity hidden in it. Some people do not like to see clergymen taking an active part in politics. This is all wrong. Moses was a priest and a lawgiver. We are commanded not to bury our talents. If a clergyman has a talent for stump oratory, why should he bury it? Don't bury any of your talents. There are people so narrow-minded that they would object should their minister play billiards, ride races, or go to the theater. And yet the poor minister might possess immense talent for all these things, the repression of which by public opinion, nearly makes him burst. Many a clergyman has been sent to a premature grave because he was condemned by public opinion to dress in black, wear a white neck-tie, move gravely, soberly and sanctimoniously about, poor man, knowing all the time that he operated like an iceberg on every circle of young folks with which he was brought in contact; and that, too, when he wanted to kick up his heels as high as any of them. I tell you the lives of the martyrs of the church have not all been written yet. Public opinion must murder no more ministers. Let 'em talk in political meetings. It will save their lives.

So now that I have convinced you of the propriety of politico theologico stump oratory, allow me to introduce the next speaker, the Rev. M. C. Briggs, whose life we must also spare. The character of Mr. Briggs' profession must have been evident, even to a casual observer, from the frequency with which he used expressions more peculiar to the pulpit than the stump. I think he in substance remarked, that piety with him had but little weight when the pious man was disposed to vote for Haight. This is rather alarming for the few thousand Democratic voters in this State, who have previously imagined themselves in good theological standing. He also remarked that not to vote at all was, in point of criminality next to venal voting. This touched me. I had previously imagined myself invulnerable to everything that could be said. I have not voted for two years. I have neglected undergoing the process of registration. I have constituted myself an American foreigner, a political pariah. But I never deemed this a crime. I thought I had a natural right to suspend the privilege of voting, and let others govern the country just as they pleased. But the Rev. Mr. Briggs has knocked my platform clear from under me, and leaves me not even a straw to grasp at. He tells me I am a political suicide. It is wicked thus to make way with one's political being. It would seem by this that one's future welfare must be materially enhanced by voting for Gorham. Because, if you vote for Haight, you must go into political outer darkness. If you don't vote at all, you must travel where there is political weeping, political wailing, and political convulsive motions of the jaws indirectly profitable to dentists. There is left but one alternative, to vote for Gorham.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

THE engagement of Mr. Edwin Adams at Maguires Opera House has proved uninteruptedly successful; the house being crowded nightly. The comedy of Men of the Day was produced on Monday, and was capitally played throughout. Mr. Adams, unlike some stars, does not exclude from his repertory of plays all save those in which his part is the center of interest. His impersonation of "Frank Hawthorne" was very fine, and he evinced his thorough training in his profession by the easy manner in which he bore himself on the stage during the long intervals which occur between his speeches. To remain on the stage unoccupied, saying nothing, in a character which affords but little opportunity for by play, tests an actor severely. Mrs. Sophie Edwin played "Lucy Vavasour" remarkably well. Mrs. Judah's impersonation the old Lancashire dame, "Mrs. Wildbriar" was a splendid bit of character acting, and the "Robin Wildbriar" of Mr. Edwards, was perfect. While these two were on the stage the audience were kept in a continual roar of laughter. Willie Edouin did some good cockney acting in the part of "James the h'upper servant."

On Wednesday evening The Lady of Lyons was presented with Edwin Adams as "Claude Melnotte," Mrs. Sophie Edwin as "Pauline," H. Edwards as "Dumas," J. A. Herne as "Glavis," Mrs. Saunders as "Mme. Deschapelles," and Mrs. Judah as the "widow." There are few theatres in the United States capable of producing this play with so perfect a cast. Everyone enjoyed a great treat in listening to Mr. Adams' fine reading of the beautiful passages which occur in his part. The description of the palace near the lake has never been so finely read on the San Francisco stage, and Mrs. Sophie Edwin afforded most efficient support by the manner in which she played "Pauline." Mr. Edwards' rendition of the part of "Col. Damas" was extremely natural, and Mr. Herne caused much fun by his impersonation of 'Glavis."

On Thursday evening, Romeo and Jutiet was presented with Edwin Adams as "Romeo," and Mrs Sophie Edwin as "Juliet." This performance was most excellent throughout. Mr. Adams is a delightful reader, and gave new force to many fine passages. The "balcony" scene was especially well rendered. Mrs. Sophie Edwin read and acted the part of "Juliet" with with very good taste, and her acting in the concluding scene was most effective. Mr. McCullough's "Mercutio" was a capital piece of acting. Mrs. Judah's "Nurse" is a very fine impersonation, as everyone is aware, and in my opinion, is superior in many points to that given by Mrs. Charles Kean during her engagement here. Mrs. Kean was altogether too funny, and broadened the character into farce; Mrs. Judah, though of course she causes much laughter, plays the character more "finely" and makes neater points. Mr. Edwards played "Friar Lawrence" in his usual good style. Mr. Herne was good as "Tybalt," and in fact all engaged performed well. Last night, The King of the Commons was played with Edwin Adams as "King James." THE CALIFORNIAN not allowing criticisms to come in late on Friday night, I can say nothing about it except register my sure and steadfast conviction that the house was crowded, and the play performed well. This afternoon, Toodles and The Rustic Prima Donna will be performed. In the evening, the grand tragedy of the Robbers will be presented. Everyone will be glad to hear that the capital comedy of Wild Oats is, in compliance with the demand of the general public, to be repeated on Monday There will be a jam that night. Everyone wishes to see Edwin Adams as "Jack Rover."

Sacred concerts are very fashionable in Paris, and every Sunday the elite of Parisian society assemble to hear the finest artists of the day perform the glorious compositions of the sacred composers. The last sacret concert given in this city was a great success both as a performance and in a pecuniary sense. To-morrow evening one of these beautiful entertainments will be given at Magnire's Opera House by the members of the Italian Opera Troupe. Many of the grandest compositions of the fine old masters whose life was one long hymn will be performed. Such music as that of Beethoven, Handel and Haydn may surely be listened to on Sunday without sin.

Last night Robert Heller the necromancer closed his engagement at the Metropolitan Theatre. The last ten nights were not successful, bnt before he went to Virginia City he made piles of money. It is gratifying to learn that Mr. Heller will not, like many professionals, take a large sum of money from this coast, as he made an extensive investment of his earuings in Virginia City where he also played a most successful engagement. We understand that Mr. Heller occasionally failed in his card tricks performed with "the little box," but the Virginia People took everything very good-naturedly, and would doubless be glad to see Heller again.

On Monday the Metropolitan opens under new management, with Miss Emma Howson as Directress, and Mr. Frank Howson, who has had an experience of twenty eight years, and is as young and energetic as ever as Manager. A very attractive series of performances has been arranged. Opera, Farce, Comedy, Burlesque and Vandeville will be preseuted in rapid succession. A capital company has been formed. First, we have the Howsons themselves, comprising Miss Emma Howson, Miss Clelia, Frank A. and John—a host in themselves. Then Henri Herberte, Miss Jennie Parker, H. D. Thompson, S. W. Leach, Miss Julia Gould, Mrs. Hall, Mr. Swift and a chorus. Never was a company better adapted for the production of burlesque than this is in this city. The performance on Monday will commence with the operetta of Mephistopheles Jr; or An Ambassador from Below, the whole of the music for which, has been composed and arranged by F. A. Howson. Miss Clelia Howson will play "Mephistopheles," and is sure to play it well. Henri Herberte will, on the conclusion of this piece, sing Sims Reeves' famous ballallad, "My Pretty Jane," and the performance will conclude with one of the best burlesques of the day, entitled Atalanta: or, the Three Golden Apples, which will be produced with new and splendid scenery by Mr. Lehman, magnificent dresses and other accessories Friday night of each week will be devoted to opera, and either an English Opera, or an adaptatiou of an Italian Opera will be performed. The Bohemiau Girl will be produced on Friday next.

On Monday week the Italian Opera Company will reopen at the Academy of Music. It is probable that the first opera produced during the new season will be L'Africaine

This famous opera has been already produced in cities far beneath San Francisco in wealth and population. If our citizens do not soon enjoy this treat it will be simply for the reason that they are unwilling to pay for it.

The fourth entertainment of the B nai B'rith Literary and Social Circle took place at Platt's Music Hall on Monday, June 24th. A large audience was present. The entertainment was a very good one, the farce of A Conjugal Lesson was well played by Mr. H. Weiner and Miss Lizzie Ezekiels, instrumental performances and recitations followed, the entertainment concluding with a gymnastic act by Mr. Philo Jacoby.

Mrs. Laura Cuppy will deliver her Sunday evening lecture as usual at Mechanics' Institute Hall. These lectures have taken a firm hold on public favor. TOCHSTONE.

WOODWARD'S GARDENS.—Crowds of persons comprising numbers of ladies and children resort to these delightful pleasure-grownds daily, to stroll through the conservatories, see the wonders of the museum, and admire the wild animals. This is a most pleasant place for a picnic.

DE PROFUNDIS.

Through the vague rifts in pearly clouds that lie
Along the horizon, 'twixt the sky and sea,
A planet's trembling radiance gleams on high,
Far, far from me.

The gentle breeze of evening loiters on,
Faint with the breath of many a tropic tree,
But groves of sandal, spice and cinnamon
Are, far from me.

O Love! I see thee glittering from afar:
Sweet airs and silvery lights encompass thee,
But—like the spice groves and the evening star—
Far, far from me!

—Geo. Arnold.

THE SMATTERER.

THE race of smatterers by the great dons of knowledge, are often looked upon in the light of social donkeys, who can find pasture on the feeble nutriment of a thistle. Pope's dictum of a little learning being a dangerous thing has greatly helped to foster a disposition among the literati to fling the mud of opprobrium or shoot the pellets of sarcasm at the heads of those whose pretences to knowledge rest on slender foundations. A full man—full, that is, in the Baconian sense—is often intolerant of the partially empty man, and feels out of patience at his shortcomings. When he imagines the mental cask to be empty, it interests him but little to know that it retains the flavor with which it had been once imbued—an Horatian idea of which Moore made good use—for in his sight it is but a hollow vessel without fragrance. a vase in which there never have been stored roses wherewith to scent it. Yet, surely, the smatterer is the superior of the ignorant. Since, according to Euclid's axiom, the whole is greater than its part, it consequently follows that the part must have more capacity than nothing; and so the possession of a modicum of knowledge is a preferable state to that which would deprive us of culture, just as a glimmering of eyesight, although far below the gift of full vision, is yet deemed a greater blessing than the "total eclipse" of Cimmerian darkness.

We would all, probably, be as clever as we could; but while it is not in mortals to command success, it certainly is, also, not in mortals to be wise at all honrs, or, perhaps, to be wise at all. Not that such would think it folly to be wise, or suppose that bliss is only to be found in ignorance; for they would be altogether incapable of recognizing their own lack of wisdom, and, in the stupendous serenity of witlessness, might even look upon themselves to be as astute as King Henry IV., of whom it was said, "his wisdom was a mirror to the wisest." In the economy of human existence there are born-fools as well as born-idiots; and although every man, according to Young, suspects himself to be a fool at thirty, and knows himself to be so at forty, and then "reforms his plan," there are some who seem never to attain to that critical age which is to bring to them knowledge and information. Like certain maiden ladies, they stop short at forty, and do not advance sufficiently near to the Delphian temple to read the golden "Know thyself" precept inscribed upon its portals. There are those to whom ignorance comes as naturally as eating, drinking, or sleeping, and who could not be otherwise than dull and stupid even under the most propitious circumstances. "It is there nature to;" and although they may seek to expel nature with a fork, even with a fork of silver, yet nature refuses to budge in the direction wished for, and obstinately continues to assert her supremacy. The horse may be taken to the water, but compulsion may fail to make him drink. The young lady who goes to a "finishing" school may be finished in the most expensive way and after the most approved style, and may yet be powerless to play a pianoforte "piece" away from her music-master, or to paint a "landscape from nature" in the abscence of her drawing-master. It is not in her; and to expect the achievement of the performance is as vain as to expect a sprat to disport itself as a salmon. Yet the little she has been able to achieve will have been of service to her. If by force of nature or circumstances we are unable to advance beyond a mere smattering of various departments of knowledge, yet even that is better than to rest in profound ignorance.

To be on the first rung of the ladder of knowledge, to have placed one's foot on the lowest step to the temple of the arts and sciences, is a secured advance, and undoubedly makes us a head taller than we were, and by so much has lifted us above those who remain on the ground level. The progress may be gradual and slow, but none the less sure and certain. Though every chemist cannot be a Faraday, yet a smattering of the science may open out fresh fields of wonder and interest to our mental view. Without being skilled botanists or geologists, we may yet master the A B C of their alphabets and abracadabra, so as to enable us to be intelligently conversant with the written records of rock and stone, and the constructive beauties of plant and flower. Shakspeare, on his friend Ben Johnson's testimony, had "small Latin and less Greek;" and yet his smattering of classical knowledge has done more to familiarize to the world the scenes and heroes of ancient Athens, Troy and Rome than if he had edited the whole cycle of Greek plays, with Latin notes, voluminous, if not luminous. The learned pedant and the lettered pundit may scorn the feeble attempts of the smatterer to achieve the full language of the arts in which they themselves have become masters; but the smatterer himself can afford to smile at their sneers, and, if he has only common sense and tact, can contrive to make his little learning go a great way. Gold is still gold, however finely it may be spread or to whatever lengths it may be drawn out.

It certainly must be confessed that smatterers are sometimes rather too prone to talk beyond their depth, and attempt to dogmatize ex cathedra and ore rotundo when they should only roar as gently as any sucking-dove, and behave themselves as lisping babes in the presence of their elders and superiors. This, however, is a failure in tact and defect in common sense. In Leech's sketch, where the precocious boy in buttons is composing a valentine, and asks the pretty housemaid what is a rhyme for Cupid, she promptly suggests "stupid" as an appropriate word; and "chatterer" might suggestively be adduced as a rhyme, if not a synonym, for smatterer.

THE THEATER AND THE OPERA IN GERMANY.

FROM THE LEIPSIC CORRESPONDENCE OF THE BOSTON GAZETTE.

IF a person would see the drama in its best dress, and learn to what a state of perfection the theater can be brought by wise management and a correct appreciation by the people whom it should instruct and amuse, he must come to Germany. With us there is such a general horror of the stage and its connections, that the theater rarely attempts to suit the tastes of the classes, but contents itself with accepting the situation in which New England straight-jacket-morality would place it in dealing out third class comedies and pantomime spectacles. There are a few noble exceptions, but I think I have not exaggerated the general standard of our American playhouses. In England it is much the same, though there are very many better play-writers in England than with us, and two theaters at least in London, the Haymarket and St. James, whose managers have succeeded in keeping the stage clear of the trash at which full fifty thousand Londoners in other theaters nightly shake their sides with laughter. That there is a great deal of licentiousness connected with the French stage, I do not deny, but it is of the licentiousness that Americans chiefly hear. It is easier for a correspondent to exercise his wit in a description of Cora Pearl than in criticising a good comedy. France thinks as a rule, more of her literary men, and honors them more than any other country, and while the plays of Scribe, Girardin and Sardou are extant, good comedy will not go begging in the chief theaters. Moreover, the immorality of which we hear so much springs from the people, not from the stage. The stage is not a leader, but a mirror which faithfully reflects the society of the day. If it is supported by lovers of sensation and pantomime, why it must alternate Mlles. Zoe and Western with "The Black Crook" and "Naiad Queen."

As soon as one enters Germany he perceives a change. He is surprised at finding an opera company in every town which boasts of fifteen thousand people. He will find great actors very rare, but the stock companies most excellent. Throughout the year the drama and opera alternate, both companies occupying the same stage, each playing three or four times a week. Let us commence with the opera. In Berlin and Vienna one can hear one hundred and thirty or forty operas a year, by the finest singers in the world and unequalled orchestras; operas never sung and rarely heard of in America, are found in the repertory, and the companies are so immense that an opera is rarely repeated so often as in our little representations of two weeks or a month's duration. The two finest tenors in the world are now engaged in Berlin, Nachtel and Niemann, and for Germany, receive tremendous salaries. Niemann is bound by contract to sing four months during each year, for which he receives six thousand dollars (this is in Deutschland please remember), and is allowed to pass the remaining eight months in singing as "gastspieler," or as we term it, in "starring."

A most admirable system prevails in Germany of pensioning aged actors and opera singers, provided they keep their contracts and remain supporters of single theatres. For example Niemann, when no longer fit for singing, will receive a pension varying with his length of service, but amply sufficient to support him and enable him to end his life in comfort. Nearly every theatre throughout Germany has this provision, and it obviates in a great measure the necessity of paying enormous salaries, as an actor, if faithful, will never be left a beggar when the public is satiated with him. The condition of their remaining by one theatre is of course necessary, but the tediousness of such an arrangement is relived by the months (three or more each year) when the actor or singer travels about as "gastspieler." Thus some of the principal singers in London, during the season there, are members of German companies, who, nevertheless, are very willing to pocket two or three hundred English sovereigns an evening during their vacation.

It would at first seem impossible that enough first class singers could be found to supply the theaters of Germany, so numerous are they, but music is so extensively cultivated and the twelve musical conservatories so rich in pupils of talent that the demand is supplied, and in no meagre way. The orchestra, chorous and ballet are almost certain to be well trained and efficient in any German opera, and this is something to be proud of when a repertory of thirty different operas is given in five months, as is the case in this city. Also, if you are in some insignificant city where permanent singers cannot be obtained, you will be sure of hearing some of the finest talent in the country once at least during the year, by means of this propensity to "star" it, and such towns are always on the look out for singers of promise from the conservatories, whom they can keep to themselves a little while, until their fame spreads and they leave for glory and a large salary.

There is the same variety in the theatrical department as in that of the opera. A great part of German play-houses are taken by subscribers, and the plays therefore must be constantly changed. These subscriptions are in the highest degree convenient, as one can play for one, two or four representations a week as he pleases, and obtain his ticket at the same rate as if he subscribed for each night of the year. For example, I bought a ticket last fall which entitles me to a seat every third representation, whatever it may be. I have gone very regularly for five months for the sake of learning the language quickly as well as for amusement, and during five months have heard only two operas and three theatrical representations a second time. I admit that in remaining another year I should notice a great deal of repetition; but if the pieces are good, which is the case here, this is to be desired. As I said before, there are few actors who can compare with Booth or Wallack or Davenport, but usually one of these actors is supported at home with a company so miserable that it requires all their genius to prevent the play from falling lifeless upon the stage. Here, when "Hamlet" is acted, the hero is not first class, but his supporters, even Rosencrantz and the second grave digger, are perfect, and there is consequently a consistency and solidity about the play which more than makes up for the defiency of Hamlet himself. The Germans require this; the journalist thinks it is duty to correct in his daily critique the humblest members no less than the chief performers.

The plays themselves are remarkably good, most of them native; but once a week one hears a translation from the English or French. I have only seen four broad farces during my stay in this city or in Dresden, and the only thing approaching a spectacle was a magic fountain upon the stage, upon which parti-colored light was thrown from an electric lamp. The prices are very low and the accommodations excellent. The audiences as a rule are dressed as with us, neither more or less, and seated as in our theaters, with but few private boxes. A stranger would doubtless think them very stingy of their applause, and indeed that enthusiasm which takes our theaters by storm is hardly ever seen here. No singer when encored repeats the aria as with us, but bows merely, and often when an actor receives an encore after fainting or killing himself, the curtain on rising discovers him in the same position in which he was last seen, and the audience is relieved from seeing a dead hero jump up and bow.

This observance of common sense rules, the excellence of the plays and actors in Germany, is owing to the interest taken in such matters by the people. The theater is either the property of the city or partly endowed by the Duke or King in whose dominions it is. As the actors are paid from the State or city, it behooves the people to see that they are good, and that the theaters themselves are as perfect as possible. As they support them they deserve to find therein good entertainment, and gentlemen of talent and experience are always appointed to the management; those having direction of the Dresden and Leipsic theaters are noblemen. Though of course there are exceptions to this, yet, as a rule, Germans go to the opera and theater, as to a musical concert, or gallery of paintings, to gratify a refined and educated taste.

Speculative Literature.—Among the announcements of Mr. Nimmo, a Scotch publisher, is a volume, by Henry Broughton, entitled "The Spirit Disembodied; when we Die we do not fall Asleep; we only Change our Place."

He that has tasted the bitterness of sin will fear to commit it; and he that has tested the sweetness of mercy will fear to offend it.

We should not forget that life is but a flower, which is no sooner fully blown than it begins to wither.

He who labors with the mind governs others; he who labors with the body is governed by others.

It is very unskillful flattery to tell a man that he isn't half so big fool as the world thinks him.

MILLINERY AND HEAD-DRESSES.—Mrs. Winship has just received, per last steamer, the latest Parisian Millinery Goods and Laces for HEAD-DRESS, consisting in part of Breakfast Caps, Point Application, Lace Valenciumes, and the Widow's Rooche, worn by the crown heads of Europe, and the only first imported to the Pacific Coast. Queen Emma, while here, replenished her wardrobe from the stock then and now on hand, at MRS. WINSHIP, No. 23 Post Street, under the Mechanics' Institute. Through the influence of Queen Emma, Mrs Winship has filled quite a number of orders for the foreign population of Honolulu. The ladies of San Francisco should call and examine these beautiful Goods, by which means they will secure the Latest Fashionable Styles.

WHAT'S THE MATTER?—In passing through Third street yesterday, we saw crowds of people entering a building a few doors below Market street, and we inquired of a passer-by what's the matter? He answered that they were going to have their pictures taken in the NEW YORK PHOTOGRAPHIC GALLERY, and the cause of the rush was that this took the best and cheapest pictures in the city; the inducement must be much to draw so big a crowd from Montgomery and the other streets in the northern part of the city.

MAYER'S BAZAAR.—R. Mayer offers at his Bazaar, corner Pine and Montgomery streets, the greatest variety of jewelry, watches, silver plated ware, guitars, music boxes; concertinas, accordeons, opera glasses, etc., etc., to the public of San Francisco, and to the country trade, at prices that defy competition, and is determined to close out his present stock at greatly reduced rates. His heavy case silver watches from the American Watch Company are superior to anything ever before offered to the public. These watches are taking the place of heavy gold watches from the fact that the workmanship is superior, the castings pure silver, and the prices low. The sale of these watches is very extensive on the Pacific coast. Another proof that American manufactures can beat the world. The works are made of platina and never get out of repair. French opera glasses of great power for sale or hire, and all kinds of musical instruments, eight day family clocks, etc. This is a rare chance to invest your money to advantage, at Mayer's Bazaar, southeast corner of Montgomery and Pine streets.

N. B.—An immense assortment of Japanese curiosities for sale.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

RESOURCES OF CALIFORNIA.

THE MECHANICS' INSTITUTE OF SAN FRANcisco hereby OFFER A PREMIUM OF ONE THOUSAND ($1,000) DOLLARS FOR THE BEST ESSAY ON THE "RESOURCES OF CALIFORNIA, AND BEST METHOD OF DEVELOPING THE SAME," under the following conditions:—One half of the premium in cash on the certified award of the Committee of Judges, and the balance from the first proceeds of sales of the successful work, which is to belong to, and will be published by, the Institute

The Essays are to be handed into the Librarian of the Institute on or before the FIRST DAY OF JUNE, 1868, and the award to be made by the Judges at the opening of the Industrial Exhibition, which is to be held in August or September following. The Essay should be divided into three heads, viz: Mineral, Agricultural and Industrial Resources, with proper subdivisions of each subject. It should be sufficient in quantity to form a duodecimo (12mo) volume of from 250 to 300 pages long primer type solid.

Writers will sign their articles in cypher, and send their names and address in sealed envelopes, which will be kept in a secure place by the Institute, and only be opened when the award is made. The manuscripts of unsuccessful writers will be returned to them without publicity.

The Committee of Judges have the right to reject all Essays, in case they do not consider them worthy of publication or the premium. No further instructions than are contained in this advertisement will be given to the Committee, nor will they be subjected to any advice from the officers or members of the institute in regard to their proposed action. All manuscript submitted must be in clear, legible writing, so as to admit of easy reading.

SAGACITY OF CHICAGO CANINES.—Since the dog slaughter in Chicago has been so mercilessly prosecuted, the canines of that city have become amazing knowing. The Times tells of one seen crouching in a corner of an alley on State street, and uttering a chuckling howl of delight as he watched the last dying agonies of a pig. The pig had eaten the dainty morsel laid down for the dog, and was the property of the officer who had laid it down. The dog evidently knew the fact, and he laughed. Another was observed to examine curiously a pailfull of slops which stood by a door-step on West Madison street. He smelled it and eyed it for full five minutes, and at last, taking it in his teeth, he carried it into an adjoining yard and turned it over, and with an exultant bark ran off. Two hundred hungry looking curs came prowling around a small shanty on the North side, evidently in search of something wherewithal to appease their hunger. Looking up at the door curiously, they read the ominous word "sausages," and with a howl of terror they ran off, and have never been seen since. They went in the direction of the lake, and who can tell what they may have done with themselves?

THE latest novelty in naval architecture is a gunboat designed by Mr. John Ericsson for the protection of the Swedish coast. It is iron-clad, and smaller than gun boats usually are. The deck is entirely below the level of the water, and is strongly protected with plating. From the deck rises a kind of sheath, oval and open at one end, above the water, and in this is worked a fifteen inch gun, which points always in the direction of the bow. The motive power is applied, not by steam, but by the arms of thirty-two men, who act by a simple and effective mechanism on a screw with four flanges. This gunboat, which is already constructed, is said to be admirably adapted to the defence of the islands, and bays and inlets, and the lakes of Sweden. The power obtained is sufficient for the reqnired purpose, and the total cost of the boat is but little over $20 000.

WAR.—The torrent and the blast can mar the lovilest scenes in natnre. War, with his ruthless hand, may rival the elements in their work of destruction; bnt it is passion alone that can lay waste the human heart. The whirlwind and the flood have duration in their existence, and have bounds for their fury, the earth recovers from the devastation of the conflict, with a fertility that seems enriched by the blood of its victims; but there are feelings that no human agency can limit, and mental wounds which are beyond the art of man to heal.

Two little boys ran away from their home in an Ohio town, one day last week, and left a note stating that they were going to the Rocky Mountains to hunt buffalo. They were captured about six miles from home, in the act of shooting at some claves with a bow and arrow taken home and put to bed without their supper.

SOME of the Nashville milliners have introdnced a paper bonnet. The precious head ornament only costs a dollar. It is calculated to keep the dear creatures in-doors in damp weather.

THE fashionables of the United States pay one million dollars annually for cut flowers. New York pays $400,000 of this sum. Boston $200.000, and the balance is estimated for the rest of the Union.

THE LOVER TO HIS SWEETHEART.

Into my heart a silent look
Flashed from thy careless eyes:
And what before were shadows, took
The light of summer skies.
A first-born love was in that look;
And Venus rose from out the deeps
Of those inspiring eyes.

My life, like some sad, lonely spot
A spirit passes o'er,
Grew instinct with a glory not
In earth or heaven before.
Sweet trouble stirred the haunted spot,
And shook the leaves of every thought
Thy spirit wandered o'er.

My being yearned and crept to thine,
As though in time of yore
My heart had been a part of thine,
And claimed it back once more.
Thy very self, no longer thine,
Was merged in that delicious life
That made us one before.

There bloom around thee forms as fair,
There murmured tones as sweet;
But o'er thee breathed the enchanted air—
'Twas life, 'twas death to meet;
And henceforth thou alone wert fair,
And though the stars had sung for joy,
They whisper only sweet.

A GENTLEMAN, who does his own marketing, purchased, among other things, on Saturday last, a pair of live lobsters. The servant being out on an errand when he returned, he personally placed the lobsters on the cement floor of the cellar. While dining, his wife heard a voice beneath, as if some combat was in progress in the cellar. A moment afterward the servant, who had been about three weeks in the country, came panting into the dining-room.

"Faith, ma'am, an' I've killed 'em both!" was her eager exclamation.

"Killed what, Catharine?"

"Faith, ma'am, two big bull cockroaches—the biggest you ever heered on."

Husband and wife looked on each other, and informed Catharine that at the table such topics must never again be touched, and resumed exercise with knife and fork.

Catharine went out, saying, in an under tone, as she descended:

"Well, this is a quare counthry, whin ye have to take hatchets to kill roaches wid, an' nothin' sthrange though of it!"

The mystery was solved after dinner. The exile of Erin had chopped the living lobsters into pieces with a hatchet, supposing them to be some variety of household vermin. There was not any lobster salad for supper that night in that domicil.

LORD ELDON AND HIS CLIENT.—Lord Eldon used to tell the following story of himself: "I was counsel for a highwayman at Durdam, who was certainly guilty, but against whom no sufficient case was made out by legal evidence. I would not aid the prosecution by cross-examination, and, remaining quiet, my client was acquitted and discharged. Sitting in my lodgings in the evening, a very ill-looking fellow, whose face I had seen before, but could not at first recollect where—for he had changed his dress—burst in, and my clerk being absent, and said, 'Lawyer Scott, you owe me two guineas. You were my counsellor to-day, and you did nothing for me. I am, therefore, come to have my fee back again; my fee I will have.' I seized the poker, and said, 'Sirrah, although you escaped to-day when you deserved to be hanged, you shall be hanged to-morrow for attempting to rob me, unless you instantly depart.' At that moment my clerk luckily came in, and the highwayman slunk off, or I am not sure that he would not have carried away with him not only his own fee, but all the fees I had received on the circuit."

SHOULD a moslem, when praying, feel himself disposed to gape, he is ordered to suppress the sensation as the work of the devil, and to close his mouth lest the father of iniquity should enter and take possession of his person. It is curious that the opinion prevails also among the Hindoos, who twirl their fingers close before their mouths before gaping, to prevent the evil one from getting in that way.

"I TELL you, my fat friend, you have no business in that boat," said Theodore Hook one day to a fat man in a dingy on the Thames. "No business in this boat, sir? What d'ye mean?" "I mean what I say;" cooly responded Hook. "You have no business in it, and I will prove it." "I think, sir, you will prove no such thing," said the navigator. "Perhaps you don't know, sir, that this is my own pleasure boat?" "That's it," said Hook, "now you have it. No man can have any business in a pleasure boat. Good day, sir."

EFFECT OF MUSIC.—A hand organist was in Germantown the other day, and the magical influence of the music was so extraordinary that when he played "Old Dog Tray," we noticed eleven pups sitting in front of the machine on their haunches, brushing away the tears from their eyes with their fore paws.

As a schoolmaster was employed the other day, in Scotland, in his delightful task of teaching a chary urchin to cipher on the slate, the precocious pupil put the following question to his instructor: "Whaur did the figures gang till when they're rubbit out?"

THE way to make money on the turf is to take a spade, put it into a donkey-cart, and drive the donkey to the nearest common. Dig up a patch, say ten feet square: take it home and hang it up topsy-tury. When dry sell it for what it will fetch. This is an infallible way of making money on the turf, and, what's more, it's something out of the common.

A MOBILE citizen having a ticket in a gift lottery was delighted to hear from the agent that he had drawn thirty articles, but on writing for them recovered from his elation on learning that they consisted or a pint of bitters containing twenty-eight ingredients, and the bottle and cork.

THE AVITOR "HERMES."

The following Report has been addressed to the Pattentee of the Avitor, by G. K. Gluyas, Esq., President of the Mechanic's Institue, and Superintending Engineer of the California S. N. Company.

Report of the Construction and Prospects of the

"AVITOR."

SAN FRANCISCO, June 7, 1867

F. MARRIOTT, ESQ—Dear Sir:—Having visited on Wednesday last, the Avitor building, at Sboll Mound Park, and inspected the machine, I take the pleasure in recording my impressions in favor of this invention. I was careful to learn details, and to study the Avitor, in order to speak, so far as I might be, with knowledge; and I am satisfied that the principle here followed is the right one.

The machine is light, solid and well finished. I think there is needed greater capacity for holding of gas, and a modification of the machine to enable it to be compressed, that the gas-holder may the more readily be filled with pure gas. The arrangements for controlling and managing the different portions of the machinery could not be better; the engine I think adequate to perform all the services required of it. As regards the probable velocity of the Avitor, I would say nothing. Once afloat, and I see nothing to hinder its floating; it is merely a question of resistance. For an invention so novel, the Avitor has met with comparatively few practical obstacles; and when it is remembered that the difficulties in the way of Fulton's experiment were much greater than those that have kept back the Avitor, and that the principal is in both cases equally sound it will be seen that there are good reasons for the belief that the machine, with the modifications referred to, will yet successfully navigate the air.

The experiments with petroleum as a steam generator, which, no doubt, will be successful, will furnish a compact and light fuel for generating steam. After the Avitor has been floated, there may be some slight changes of the propelling machinery suggested, but, ultimately, it must be a success. The expense to make the contemplated changes, or rather enlargement, of the machine, I think, will be under three thousand dollars.

Hoping and firmly believing in the success of your enterprise, I remain your obedient servant,

GEO. K. GLUYAS.

OPINION OF PETER DONAHUE ESQ.

I have followed with great interest, and have personally observed the construction of the Avitor. I am so thoroughly convinced of the practicability of the enterprise, and so entirely concur in the foregoing observations of Geo. K. Gluyas, Esq., respecting the two modifications to be adopted, that I have no hesitation in saying that, when these changes are made, the Avitor will answer all the purposes of its inventor, and fully realize the expectations of the public. As soon as the elevating power shall, in this way, have been perfected, the work will be completed because the propelling force is ample, the machinery for elevating and depressing sufficient, and steering apparatus in fine working order, and, in short, the whole of the Avitor is fully under the control of the operation PETER DONAHUE ESQ.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

TO

Purify the Blood.

NOT A FEW OF THE WORST DISORDERS THAT afflict mankind arise from the corruption that accumulates in the blood. Of all the discoveries that have been made to purge it out, none have been found which could equal in effect AYER'S COMPOUND EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. It cleanses and renovates the blood, instills the vigor of health into the system and purges out the humors which make disease. It stimulates the healthy functions of the body, and expels the disorders that grow and rankle in the blood. Its extraordinary virtues are not yet widely known, but, when they are, it will no longer be a question what remedy to employ in the great variety of afflicting diseases that require an alterative remedy. Such a remedy, that could be relied on, has long been sought for, and now, for the first time, the public have one on which they can depend. Our space here does not admit certificates to show its effects. But the trial of a single bottle will show to the sick that it has virtues surpassing anything they have ever taken. Sufferers from Scrofula, Scrofulous Swellings and Sores, try it and see the rapidity with which it cures. Skin Diseases, Pimples, Pustules, Blotches, Erysipelas, etc., are soon cleaned out of the system.

St. Anthony's Fire, Rose or Erysipelas, Tetter or Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Ringworm, etc., should not be borne while they can be so speedily cured by AYER'S SARSAPARILLA.

Syphilis or Venereal Disease is expelled from the system by the prolonged use of this SARSAPARILLA, and the patient is left as healthy as if he never had the disease.

Female Diseases are caused by Scrofula in the blood, and are generally soon cured by this EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. Price $1 per bottle, or 6 bottles for $5.

For all the purposes of a family physic, take AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS, which are everywhere known to be the best purgative that is offered to the American People.

Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass., and sold by all Druggists and dealers in medicine everywhere.

NEW REMEDIES! NEW REMEDIES!

Dr. Gibbon's Dispensary.

ESTABLISHED IN 1854,
616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco.

For the treatment of Sexual and Seminal Diseases, such as gonorrhœa, gleet, stricture, syphilis in all its forms, seminal weakness, impotency, &c. Skin Diseases, (of years' standing,) and Ulcerated legs, successfully treated.

HORRIBLE DISEASES.

How many thousands of persons both male and female are there who are suffering out a miserable existence from the effects of secret indulgence, or from virus absorbed into the system. Look at their pallid, emaciated and disfigured faces, and their broken constitutions, disqualifying them for the happiness of marriage or the enjoyment of life. In this horrid situation thousands suffer until death closes the scene. Let parents, guardians and friends, attend to those who are suffering with any of these horrible, life-destroying maladies—see that they are cared for and cured before it be too late. Send them to Dr. Gibbon, a physician who has made private diseases his especial study for years, and who is certain to cure the most inveterate cases without mercury or any injurious drugs. It is important to those who are afflicted, to be careful of the many pretended Doctors who infest all cities, publishing their skill in curing all diseases in a few days, imposing upon the public by using the names of eminent physicians from Europe and other places. Be therefore careful and make strict inquiry, or you may fall into the hands of these charlatans.

Syphilis is syphilis the world over; so is small pox, consumption, and other diseases, to the contrary of what quacks may say.

SEMINAL WEAKNESS.

Seminal weakness the consequent of self abuse. This solitary vice, or depraved sexual indulgence, is practiced by the youth of both sexes to an almost unlimited extent, producing with unerring certainty the following train of morbid symptoms, unless combatted by scientific medical measure; sallow countenances, dark spots under the eyes, pain in the head, ringing in the ears, noise like the rustling of leaves and rattling of chariots, uneasiness about the loins, weakness of the limbs, confused vision, blunt intellect, loss of confidence, diffidence in approaching strangers, a dislike to form new acquaintances, a disposition to shun society, loss of memory, hectic flushes, pimples and various eruptions about the face, furred tongue, fetid breath, coughs, consumption, night sweats, monomania, and frequent insanity. If relief be not obtained, should apply immediately, either in person or by letter, and have a cure effected by his new and scientific mode of treating this complaint, which never fails of effecting a quick and radical cure. Dr. G. will give $100 to any person who will prove satisfactorily to him that he was cured by either of the San Francisco quacks.

Dr. Gibbon is responsible, and will give each patient a written instrument binding himself to effect a radical and permanent cure or make no charge.

Persons at a distance may be cured at home by addressing a letter to Dr. Gibbon, stating case, symptoms, length of time the disease has continued, and have medicine promptly forwarded, free from damage and curiosity, to any part of the country, with full and plain directions for use, for ten dollars, sent in a registered letter, or through Wells, Fargo & Co.

Address DR. J. F. GIBBON, 616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco, Postoffice Box 252.

CAUTION TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

Beware of the San Francisco quacks and pretenders who with bogus sworn-to certificates, dupe the unwary. Some of the self styled doctors whose names are to be found in all the daily and weekly papers of San Francisco and other places, are tradesmen, and become too lazy to work at their trade. Some are tinsmiths, shoemakers, newspaper carriers, intelligence offices keepers, etc. Look over the San Francisco City Directory and you will find their former occupation in it. Look at the Directory for 1862-63. The only way to avoid imposition is make inquiry—it will cost you nothing and may save you many regrets, for advertising physicians in eight cases out of ten are bogus, there is no safety in trusting any of them till you know who and what they are. Dr. Gibbon does not deceive people by exhibiting bogus titles, certificates, pretended patients' letters, etc. Dr. Gibbon will satisfy persons who may call at his office of his ability to treat diseases that he proposes to cure.

☞ Persons writing to Dr. Gibbon will Please state the name of the paper they see his advertisement in.

EDWARD J. QUIRK, Plaintiff, vs. JAMES P. HORBACH, et als., Defendants

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the said city and county of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES P. HORBACH, HENRY DELVENDAHL, HENRY BREMMERMAN, ERNST JANSSEN and GUSTAV HELMKE, Defendants:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this District, within twenty days otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to require you, the said defendants, to set forth the nature of your respective claims to that certain lot or parcel of land situate in said city and county of San Francisco, as particularly described in the complaint herein, being subdivision No 5 of the 100 vara lot known on the map of the city of San Francisco as No. 276, as designated on a plat of the original subdivision thereof, recorded in the office of the County Recorder of said city and County, in Liber 1 of Certified Grants, at page 156, that all adverse claims of said defendants and each of them may be determined by a decree of this Court; that by said decree it be declared and adjudged that the said defendants, each and all of them, have no estate or interest whatever in or to said parcel of land, and that the title of plaintiff thereto is good and valid; that said defendants, and each of them, be forever debarred from asserting any claim whatever in and to said land adverse to plaintiff, and for such other and further relief as to this Hon. Court shall seem meet and agreeable to equity, with costs of suit against such of the defendants as shall defend this action.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in said complaint.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, this 25th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven.

GRAND TRIAL

....OF....

SEWING MACHINES.

CONTEST BETWEEN THE

FLORENCE AND WILLCOX & GIBBS.

THE

WILLCOX & GIBBS

TRIUMPHANT!

At the Great UNION FAIR, held at Island Park, between Albany and Troy, in September, two Premiums were offered on Sewing Machines, one for the BEST and the other for the "Second Best"—competition being open to the State.

On the first day of the Fair, the Troy Agent of Florence Sewing Machine Company, having, jointly with the Albany Agent of the same Machine, entered it for competition, published in the Troy Daily Times a challenge to Agents of other Sewing Machines, to meet them at said Fair and compete with them for the Premium.

The challenge was accepted by the Troy and Albany Agents of the Willcox and Gibbs Machine.

Each party was to prepare and subject to the judges a "list" of the several "points of merit" on account of which "superiority" was claimed. These "points" were to be separately considered, thoroughly investigated and practically tested, by work done then and there, upon each of the machines; and then decided in favor of the machine which was adjudged to excel on that "point."

Finally it was agreed that the machine which, at the conclusion of the trial, should be found to have the greatest number of those "points" decided in its favor should be decided the "BEST SEWING MACHINE," and awarded the FIRST PREMIUM.

The result of the trial was, that the

WILLCOX & GIBBS WON THE VICTORY

and the prize, by the extraordinary superiority of thirty-five points, decided in its favor, against two points in favor of the Florence.

Full notes were taken of the trial.

It is a fact worthy of remark, that during the entire trial—which continued without intermission for nearly seven hours—not a stitch was missed, nor the thread once broken, nor a needle broken or bent, by the Willcox and Gibbs machine. No kind of work was attempted to be done on it that was not accomplished, and done in a perfect and workmanlike manner; and no effort was made on it that was not entirely successful; while neither of these statements can be truly made in favor of the Florence.

This remarkable trial can not fail, through the facts developed by it, to be productive of important results. It has raised the veil and exposed to public view the true character of the opposition, who will no longer be able to deceive the public by misrepresenting the character and merits of the Willcox and Gibbs machine.

It is an improvement on double thread machines; and its "stitch," which was severely tested by the Judges, was decided to be much stronger and less liable to rip in use or wear than the "Lock Stitch."

It is the simplest in construction—does the greatest variety of work—makes no noise—is not liable to get out of order—costs the least money, and gives the best satisfaction.

☞ Full reports of this trial sent free to any address.

BABBITTONIAN,

OR SELF-TEACHING

PENMANSHIP!

The System of Babbitonian Penmanship is preeminently self-instructing. With its ample explanations of right and wrong forms—its sixty wood cuts—its plain intelligent rules, one may sit down by his own fireside and become a finer Penman than he could at much greater cost in the usual way with a living teacher.

The cause of a great demand for fine Penmen in the commercial world, and this system, at a trifling expense, imparts a skilful command of the Pen, worth hundreds of dollars to the fortunate possessor.

Penmanship is an indispensable accomplishment to Ladies, and this system is elaborate in a series of elegant copies in the Ladies' Style.

Business men have sometimes lost thousands of dollars from ignorance in regard to Business forms, and there is furnished in a set, without additional charge, a fine variety of Business Forms and Abbreviations. To sum up the Excellencies of this System, it is—

1—Scientific in its Arrangement of Principles;
2—Artistic in its Movements and Flourishes;
3—Practical in its Combinations and Applications;
4—Stylish in its neat and chaste Gracefulness;
5—Superior for Legibility, Rapidity and Beauty;
6—Most Disciplinary for fingers, Arms and Muscles.
7—Unexcelled for Comprehensiveness and Simplicity.
8—Complete and Self-Teaching for Private Learners;
9—Time, Labor and Expense Saving for Pupils and Teachers.

The Babbitonian Penmanship

Is published on durable card-board slips, ninety-two copies illustrated, put in a neat package with a Chart, the whole complete at the low price of $1 50.

Babbittonian Pens.

One reason why the country is flooded with poor Pens is that they are generally made by mechanics, rather than by artistic and experienced Penmen, the only parties really understanding the requirements of a good article.

The Babbittonian Pens,

Made in the most finished style, by skilful artisans, after models prepared according to the combined wisdom and experience of several amateurs and old Professors of Penmanship, are admirably adapted to meet the public wants.

The Babbittonian Ladies' Pen,

Is one of the most exquisite little instruments for delicate writing ever constructed.

The Babbittonian Extra Fine Pen,

Is pronounced by a large number of Penmen to be more free, more durable, and more varied in capacity for either fine or coarse strokes than any foreign Pen whatever. Suitable for elegant writing, it is a great favorite with the ladies and gentlemen.

The Babbittonian Business Pen,

Having great freedom and variety of movement, is unequaled for general business or school purposes. Somewhat coarser than the Extra Fine, it wears longer and moves more easily on paper.

☞ This Pen is now in use in the large counting houses and banks in this city.

A RARE GEM OF ART.

"The Lord's Prayer,"

A pen drawing, by Mr. D. F. Brown, is one of the most remarkable works of art ever exhibited in this country. By patient labor he has succeeded in producing a design which for skill and beauty of execution, exquisite softness and delicacy of finish, and general merit, it would seem scarcely possible to surpass. The central figure—the face of our savior—is one of marvelous power and beauty. This and the faces of the Twelve Apostles, forming the border of the piece, are faithful copies from Leonardo da Vinci's famous painting of the

LAST SUPPER,

Reproducing, with the softest and most perfect shadings, the conceptions and characteristic expressions of the originals. Within this enclosure the words of the Lord's Prayer, in ornamental letters of various original designs and exquisite finish, are an interesting study of art in themselves; while appropriately distributed among these minature groups and scenes of marked events of Savior's life, copied from the great masters—five of them from Raphael's celebrated designs—form a harmonious completion of this unique, beautiful and truly wonderful work. The faces of

OUR LORD AND HIS APOSTLES.

Alone, so finely copied, would be a treasure in any house, and worth the full price of subscription.

THE LION'S MOUTH.

"I will roar, that I will do any man's heart good to hear me." A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

"Nil falsi audeat, nil veri non audeat dicere." CICERO

The Bulletin's Lady Correspondent.

It is gratifying to learn that the female individual, whoever it may be, who does up letters from Paris for the Bulletin, has altered her opinion about the Prince of Wales since she has seen him. In one letter she said he had "developed into a graceless man," but in that published in the Bulletin of last Monday, she expresses a very different opinion She says that she went to the Prince's reception at Lord Cowley's and there she saw him. He is a "pleasant looking gentleman," "his air is frank and manly, and his laugh is hearty and pleasing," "There is a great deal of cordiality expressed in his shake of the hand and of self possession and amiability in his address." He seems to be now, instead of a "graceless man," "a perfect love of a Prince," in the estimation of the "lady" who writes letters for the Bulletin. In the letter which appeared in the issue of the following day, this extraordinary female says that she went to a ball given by Lady Cowley, in honor of the Prince, and describes the manner in which she behaved herself while there. Observing the Queen of the Belgians convers ing with Louis Napoleon during supper, she got as close as possible to them for the purpose of overhearing what was said.

"Your correspondent secured a seat immediately behind the Queen of the Belgians, so that it is not on hearsay she reports the brief answers of that exalted lady to Napoleon's observations."

The "lady correspondent" previously stated that she stood at the door, so we are a little doubtful as to the truth of the above statement. When she says:

"I remember having once visited during dinner, the servants' hall, at an English nobleman's, and being struck with the gusto and strong sense of enjoyment with which the score or so of meniuls there ulied their knives and forks."

We may believe her, and also suppose that she dined at the same time. She pretends to be surprised at the manner in which the sovereigns ate. She describes them at supper, thus:

"Their Majesties and Highnesses proved themselves first-rate trencbermen. They ate with appetite, every chick of 'em and drank with unconcealed relish their wines; and they prolonged their enjoyment so late as 3 o'clock in the morning. Chins wagged all the while, and dishes of which many were hot ones, were rapidly emptied."

Then she tells us that Donald, the Duke of Edinburgh's piper, was next introduced, and "first was put to play in the group at the door where I stood. But we made by pantomime, such an energetic protest, that Lord Cowley sent bim to walk up and down, when playing, behind the Empress. Our protests greatly amused the Prince of Wales, who pointed out to his next neigbbor a lady who had stopped her ears with her fingers. Her Imperial Majesty, as Donald blew his execrable blasts, jogged up and down in her chair and flourished her arms about her head." Now we ask the Bulletin if this is not pitching it just a little too strong. If it must have an account of the doings of the assembled sovereigns in Paris, under the heading of "From Our Lady Correspondent," let it get a lady to compile it from French papers. Let it get a lady who, even if she KNOWS less about the servants' halls of English noblemen, has a little more idea of bow ladies and gentlemen—for kings and queens are generally ladies and gentlemen—conduct themselves. The idea of the protests of "the lady correspondent of the Bulletin" having sufficient weight with Lord Cowley to induce him to send the piper to annoy the Empress rather than the aforesaid individual, is a little too rich. This party knows too many great people entirely, she has quiet chats with the sister of the Queen of Portugal, and is, in fact, hand and glove with "every chick of 'em." It is just a little too much for the money, and the Bulletin should stop it.

The Eighth Wonder of the World.

San Francisco is highly blessed in possessing fine buildings, and fine writers to make the world aware of the fact. The editor of the Flag speaking of the new Bank of California, which is really a very handsome building, says:

"The falterings of local reporters convey no sort of idea of its classic magnificence and judicious lavishment of wealth."

Then he sails in. There is no faltering about him:

"In talking with a great many enlightened and well traveled foreigners, we have not yet found one who would say that he had ever seen any building, of like dimensions, which, as a work of designers' and builders' art, was actually more beautiful. It is not quite natural to think that right here, under our sight, we can have a building equal to anything of the kind in the world; we want to go abroad to see wonderful things, as the Italian peasant might look beyond the dome of St. Peter's for something loftier and grander.

Let us not look beyond the Bank of California for something loftier and grander. Let us rest and be thankful. The editor of the Flag says:

"If there be any more artistic and beautiful edifice, anywhere, than the new Bank of California, in the new city of San Francisco, we want to find out its location?"

There isn't. Westminster Abbey is a hovel compared to it, and there isn't one of the new buildings in Paris half so artistic and beautiful. That it is a miracle of art and justly entitled to be termed "The Eighth Wonder of the World" is conclusively proved by the following:

"The writer of this went thirty-odd times to see the play of "Arrah-Na Pogue," and as often as "Richelieu" has been performed in his neighboorhood; and in like manner, he has never passed the edifice in question, without instinctively pausing to look at and admire what he had seen a hundred times. This we conceive to be the highest tribute to genius—that which has the power to arrest and transfix the indifferent; and we must therefore render to the architects and constructors of that rich and splendid affair our fullest and unqualified admiration. We do not think that anything more appropriate to the purpose, and transcendently beautiful, will be fashioned, in this age, from wood and stone."

The editor of the Flag is evidently an intelligent man. A man who went thirty-odd times to see the play of Arrah-na-Pogue (Ye Gods! !) may be said, by that constant attendance merely, to have acquired a liberal education. He is right when he says that his instinctive pause and look, constitute the highest tribute to genius. Ah! indeed. Many an age will pass away, thrones will tremble, and empires decay, before another building like the Bank of Califorula is reared on this globe. The writer of that article has genius. We are grieved when, toward the close, he allows himself to be so overpowered by his genius as to become incoherent. He glorifies the blue stone of Angel Island as far above any marble, and implies that any one can dwell in marble halls, but blue stone balls are indeed rich and rare. He describes it:

"That fine-grained stone, chiseled with the finish and delecacy of a parlor mantle-peice, is what makes that structure a literal temple which the divinest goods of mythology would have delighted to dwel in."

It is a sad reflection that the divinest goods of mythology cannot dwell—or be stored—in the Bank of California. They hadn't such buildings in the old heathen times, they had a Colosseum, it is true, but the Bank of Califorula entirely "lays over" that. The publication in the Flag, of even one article, so brilliant as that from which we have made the above extracts, should be sufficient of itself, to entitle the proprietor, Mr. D. O. McCarthy, to the support of every man in San Francisco, and secure his election to the office of State Printer. What a head!

On Maps.

An individual came into our editorial den, the other day, and displayed a colored map of North America. He wanted us to buy it. Told the man we wanted no map of North America—had no interest in North America—did not own a foot of ground on the continent, save and except two or three dry ranches up country, which we couldn't sell, give away, or hypothecate for us much as a car ticket. The man with the parti-colored map of North America, looked at us, at first, indignantly, then wonderingly, and at last, sorrowfully, as a man without a country, without a home, without patriotism. "Tell me, said he:

"Is this the man, with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land?"

"Right, my man," said we, "North America has never more than half supported us, and we disown her."

"Why don't you try the recent Russian purchase?" returned he.

"We've had enough of a cold, cold world, without emigrating to the polar regions," said we. Then the man sorrowfully folded up his picture of the continent, and went away. We felt sorry for him, sorry for ourself; but what's the use of a map to a man, who, in a geographical point of view, is without any valuable landed interest in the country, and who never expects to travel or have any friends who will travel.

Ode to the Fourth of July Night.

O, sulphurous, noisy eve,
Resonant with the cracker's din and pistol pop.
Sleep from nine thousand pillows, pressed
By patriotic, but uneasy heads, is scared,
And as the sons of glorious sires,
Who fit and bled in "'76,"
Twist, turn and thrash about in bed,
I hear them growl
That ever Independence was declared.
Hark to that drunkard's bowl,
As filled with liquid diabolical,
He surges heavily through the smoky streets.
Ere morn he'll fall,
And in the gutter lie, as patriotic ruin.
The hall bell sounds alarm of fire!
O, lucky man, whose house now burns,
For he has something now to do,
In snatching from devouring flames,
His goods and chattels,
And need not toss upon his couch
And curse Columbus
For discovering America!

A Spiritualistic Revelation.

The unfortunate "M." of the Todd-spirit organ, in this city, copies the ungrammatical theatrical puffs of the Dramatic Chronicle and charges them to THE CALIFORNIAN; thus.

A DRAMATIC CRITIC CRITICIZED.—

"Mrs Sophie Edwin done well as 'Madeline,' and so did Mrs. Judah as 'Widow Barton.'

"The same the same:

"William Hayward, the balladist, and a couple of educated dogs, were at Sandy Hill, N. Y.

"Would it not have been well to have stated whether the said dogs are 'thoroughly' educated! The editor of the CALIFORNIAN might wish to know. In case they are only 'half' educated dogs, he of the CALIFORNIAN cannot receive them into his family. M."

We have long feared that Todd Spiritism (quite a new variety) would entirely destroy "M.'s" brain. He may, perhaps, not be aware that the "dramatic criticisms" of the small paper which said "Mrs. Sophie Edwin done well," are not written by the editor of THE CALIFORNIAN.

A Bloated Aristocrat.

An exchange says:

"President Johnson dresses for his afternoon walk with a scrupulous nicety, in itself sufficient to attract attention He wears gloves, carries a cane and his iron-gray hair is smoothly rolled under."

Good gracious! How thankful we should be that this bloated aristocrat will not much longer occupy the Presidential chair. Wears gloves! No doubt in imitation of the monarchs of Europe who wear gloves. Carries a cane! This is shocking. We could excuse President Johnson's wearing neatly-fitting clothes in consideration of the fact that he was once famous for giving good fits to his customers, but when he wears gloves, carries a cane, and wears his iron-gray hair smoothly rolled under, no wonder the loyal and outspoken press of the country call attention to the lamentable fact. Those gloves have been the ruin of him. The people have for a long time been begging him to handle unrepentant rebels without gloves.

Natural, but not cheerful.

It is well-known that undertakers are, as a rule, the most jovial fellows, always ready for a bit of fun, and ever careful to refrain from indulging in conversation which might lead to a suspicion that they had an eye to business, in forming social relations. When we saw the name of Atkins Massey, the well-known undertaker, as assistant marshal in the third division of the Fourth of July procession, we said, "That's all right; he'll engineer his part of the procession as neatly as if it were a thousand dollar funeral." But we were a little shocked when we saw that Mr. Massey had a Coffin with him. There it stands:

"Atkins Massey and Zenas Coffin, Assistant Marshals."

It was, perhaps, natural for Mr. Massey to have a coffin handy, but if we had been in his place, we should, under the circumstances, have begged that Mr. Zenas Coffin be assigned a position a little further off

Buried Alive.

Are there any children missing from the homes of their distracted parents? If so, we can tell them where to look for them. The loose sand descended in huge avalanches as people scrambled up the bills surrounding the place where the squibs and crackers were let off, at an expense of $3,000, on the Fourth of July. No doubt scores of children were buried alive, and many may be even now vainly attempting to struggle to the surface. We implore the Board of Supervisors to send the steam-paddy to scoop out those unfortunate infants. The display of fire-works was melancholy enough without the additional sadness which would be caused by such a fearful loss of life.

A STRING OF HIGHWAYMEN. I. DICK TURPIN.

MR. RICHARD TURPIN rode many miles from the time he left the cradle till he reached the gibbet, but he never rode from London to York, nor, in fact, did any one ever accomplish that extraordinary ride. The myth is, however, founded on a real incident. In 1676, one Nicks, a robber hanuting the road between Chutham and London to rob sailors returning to town with their pay, and Kentish traders on their way to London, plundered a traveler at four o'clock in the morning on the slope of Gadshill, the spot immortalised by Shakespeare, and for ever associated with Falstaff's delightful poltroonery. Being on a blood mare, a splendid buy, Nicks determined to prove an alibi in case of danger. He rode off straight to Gravesend; there detained an hour for a boat, he prudently baited his horse; then crossing the water, he dashed across Essex, full tilt to Chelmsford, rested half an hour, and gave his horse some balls. Then he mounted and flashed on to Bramborough, Bocking and Wetherfield, fast across the downs to Cambridge; quick by by-roads and across country, he slipped past Godmanchester and Huntingdon to Fenny Stratford, where he haited the good mare and took a quick half-hour's sleep. Then once more along the north road till the cathedral grew up over the horizon larger—larger, and whiz—he darted through York gate. In a moment he had led the jaded mare into an inn stable, snapped up some food, tossed off some generous life-giving wine, nnd in a fresh dress—say green velvet and gold lace—strolled out, gay and calm, to the Bowling-green, then full of company. The lord mayor of the city happening to be there, Nicks sauntered up to him, and asked him the hour. "A quarter to eight." "Your most obedient." When Nicks was apprehended and tried for the Gadshill robbery, the prosecutor swore to the man, the place, and the hour; but Nicks brought the lord mayor of York to prove an alibi, and the jury disbelieving in Sir Boyle Roach's bird anywhere out of Ireland, acquitted the resolute and sagacious thief.

Nevertheless, Richard Turpin's career is not uninteresting, as he was a tolerably fair type of the highwaymen of George the Second's time, although there was nothing especially gallant or chivalrous about the rascal. His career shows the sort of people from whom the highwaymen obtained their recruits, the light in which society regarded them, and the inevitable ride up Holborn-hill to Tyburn-tree, to which two-thirds of them came after a short career of alternate beggary and riot.

Richard Turpin was the son of the landlord of the Bell at Hempstead, in Essex, who bound him apprentice to a Whitechapel butcher. Having served his time, Turpin set up as a butcher in Essex, on the economical principle of stealing all the cattle he sold. Being at last detected, he joined some smugglers in the hundreds of Essex; but finding this mode of life too precarious, the ex-butcher headed a gang of deer-stealers which infested Epping Forest. Deerstealing growing dangerous, Turpin and his men took to hur-glary, beginning by getting four hundred pounds from an old woman at Laughton, under threat of roasting her on the grate. At Ripple-side, also, they broke into a house, blindfolded the farmer and his family, and secured eighty pounds each. "That'll do," said Turpin; and getting bolder now, the gang (in Turpin's absence) resolved to attack various persons who had attempted to betray them. Four of them broke into the house of Mason, a forest-keeper, killed Mason, threw him under a dresser, drove the women naked into the farm-yard, broke everything in the house, and were lucky enough to see a hundred and twenty guineas stream from an old punch-bowl that they wantonly smashed. Six of them next broke into the house of Mr. Saunders, a rich farmer at Charleston, in Kent. They bound the farmer's friends, who were at cards, and then forced Saunders to go with them and open all his boxes, closets, and escritoires, till they had obtained a hundred pounds in money and all the plate. They drank a bottle of wine, ate some mince-pies, and forced the fettered prisoners to take some brandy. They then packed up the booty, and made off, threatening to return and murder all the family if they dared to move outside the house for two hours, or if they ventured to advertise the marks on the plate. This robbery was planned at Woolwich. After effecting it, the robbers crossed the water to an empty house in Ratcliff-highway, and there quietly divided their spoil. They now got so daring and reckless that, as early as seven o'clock one January evening in 1738, they forced their way into the house of a Mr. Lawrence, at Edgeware. They only obtained about thirty pounds, but threatened to burn the farmer alive if he did not discover where his money was hid. A reward of fifty pounds for their apprehension had no effect in alarming Turpin's gang; for the next month they broke into the house of Mr. Francis, a farmer, near Marylebone, and stole thirty-seven pounds, some rings, diamonds, and a silver tankard. The women were bound and guarded by one of the band, while Turpin and another, with loaded pistols, stood over the men, who were tied up in the stable.

Kent, Essex, and Middlesex were now in arms; for no one seemed safe, and the pottering old constables, and the fussy and still more imbecile county magistrates, were powerless. Mr. Thompson, one of the king's park-keepers, having, however, got a promise from the Duke of Newcastle for payment of one hundred pounds for the apprehension of Turpin or any of his colleagues, the thieves began to grow more wary. One night, as Turpin and three others were carousing in an ale-house in an alley at Westminster, the constables burst in and seized three of the robbers, but Turpin leaped through a window and escaped. These three men were eventually hung in chains very soon after.

Turpin, finding that nearly all his old friends were given to the crows, now set off for Cambridgeshire. On his way, he stopped a well dressed man and threatened to blow out his brains because he bantered him, and was not quick enough in handing out his purse.

"What! dog eat dog?" said the man. "If you don't know me better, Mr. Turpin, I know you, and shall be glad of your company."

It proved to be King, a notorious highwayman, who at once entered into partnership with Turpin in all his robberies. As no landlord, however rascally, would now entertain these rough-riders, the two men dug a cave, hidden by brambles, hazels and thorns, near the high road between King's oak and Loughton road. The cave, large enough to hold both them and their horses, was well situated for reconnoitring. Turpin's wife supplied them with food.

They one night stopped a Mr. Bradele, and their treatment of him is characteristic of highwaymen's etiquette. Mr Bradele gave up his money readily, but was loth to part with his watch, till his little girl cried, and begged him to surrender it. King then insisted on having an old valueless mourning-ring, but seeing Mr. Bradele prized it, he said he and his pal were too much of gentlemen to deprive him of anything he valued so much. Mr. Bradele then offered to leave six guineas at the bar of the Dial in Birchin-lane, and to ask no questions if he might keep his watch and his ring. King accepted the offer.

Soon after this a servant of Mr. Thompson, the park-keeper, and a daring higgler set out to trap Turpin in his cave. Turpin took them for poachers, till the servant presented his gun, and called on the highwayman to surrender. Turpin gradually retreated to his cave, took up his loaded carbine, and shot the too-venturous servant dead. The other then ran off. Turpin soon after was nearly surprised at an inn at Hertford, and then made for London, through the forest. Finding his horse tire, he stopped Mr. Major, owner of the famous racer, White Stockings, changed horses, and dashed off to London. Mr. Major confiding his loss to Mr. Boys, landlord of the Green Man at Epping, Mr. Boys took it very much to heart, and devoted his time to discovering Turpin's lair. He at last found Mr. Major's horse at the Red Lion Inn, in White chapel. He seized the man who came to fetch it, who proved to be King's brother, and who confessed that a tall lusty man in a white duffel coat was then waiting for it in Red Lion street. Mr. Boys going out, and seeing it was King, the highwayman, instantly attacked him. King drew a pistol and flashed it at Boys' breast, but it missed fire, and his second pistol got entangled in his pocket. Just then Turpin dashed up, and King shouted:

"Dick, shoot him, or we are taken, by ——"

Turpin instantly fired, missed Mr. Boys and shot his friend, who died a few days afterwards. King taxed Turpin with cowardice and treachery, and betrayed his haunt in Hackney-marsh to Mr. Boys; but advised him to be cautious, as Turpin usually carried three brace of pistols, and had a carbine slung at his back.

Turpin's haunts being now known, the not very chivalrous scoundrel stole off to Lincolnshire, where he lived by sheep and horse stealing, and by raids into Yorkshire, hiding at Machet Cave, North Cave and Welton, and often riding back to Long Sutton, Lincolnshire, with a string of stolen horses, which he sold, without exciting much suspicion. Our most romantic render will have observed the utter want of true courage and gallantry in this man's whole career. Never fighting against odds or in fair combat, always intent upon the guineas, and taking care to be superior in force to the traveler he stopped, cruel to unarmed farmers, he was a mere mounted thief, and nothing else. In the first real dangerous scuffle, he loses his head, and shoots his old companion, either by treachery or mistake. Burglar, sheep-stealer, horse-stealer, smuggler, his hands were now red with murder, and the whole country was up against him. No more revels in Westminster lanes, Blood Bowl-alley, or Thieving lane; no more selling plate to Jew receivers. The thief-takers were on his heels.

Turpin's blustering insolence and cruelty led at last to his betrayal. Returning one day from shooting at Long Sutton, he wantonly and in cold blood shot one of his neighbor's fowls, and threatened to blow out the brains of a friend who remonstrated. He was instantly apprehended, at once discovered to be the famous horse-stealer and highwayman, and was sent off in chains to York Castle. The farmers crowded to prison to identify their ruthless spoiler, and he became one of the shows of the ancient city. Nothing, however, daunted him; he spent his time joking, drinking, and telling stories, and was "as jovial, merry, and frolicsome, as if he was quite at liberty and insured for a good hundred years of life." He scoffed at the chaplain, and expressed no remorse for any of his thousand and one villanies.

His vanity was chiefly busy in preparing for the last scene, and he bought a new fustian frock and a pair of pumps to take his leave of the world respectably. The morning before his execution he gave three pounds ten shillings among five men, who were to follow the cart as mourners, and to purchase black hatbands and gloves for several more. He also left a gold ring and two pairs of shoes to one of his mistresses who lived at Brough. John Stead, a horse-stealer, was his companion in the cart; but all eyes were turned on Turpin as he bowed to the ladies and waved his cocked-hat with the cotrage and effrontery of his class. After he mounted the ladder, he talked half an hour with the hangman, then threw himself resolutely off, and died in a moment.

He was only thirty-three, but in that time he had performed as much mischief as a man well could. His body lay in state all that day at the Blue Boar at Castle-gate and the next morning was buried in St. George's churchyard within Fishergate postern. The next evening the surgeon dug up the body for dissection, and removed it to a garden. The mob, with a sympathy so often misplaced, was furious, and carried the corpse on a board covered with straw in triumph through the streets of York; they then strewed the coffin with lime, replaced the body, and interred it in the old place.

II. HALF-HANGED SMITH.

Naval officers, who have been saved from drowning at the last moment, have recorded their impressions of their feelings, as they sank down fathoms deep into a liquid grave; at that moment, we are told, the pressure on the brain sometimes seems to wake the memory into supernatural activity, and every small detail of past life defiles in one instant before the eyes. Men, after weeks of cannibalism, have described the miseries that drove them to that horrible extremity, and the remorse that followed the act. After the Black Hole business at Calcutta, there was one reflective man who survived to set down in writing the horrible phenomena of excessive and prolonged thirst. Not many philosophers, however, have escaped from the gallows to tell us feelings that follow hanging; of the few that have, Half-Hanged Smith's experiences are the most curious.

Smith was the misguided son of a farmer at Malton, Yorkshire. He was bound apprentice to a packer in London, and afterwards went on board of a man of war, and distinguished himself in Sir George Rook's gallant attack on the French, and Spanish galleons at Vigo in 1702. He then enlisted in the Guards, became thievish and dissolute, and turned house-breaker and highwayman. On the 5th of December, 1705, he was arraigned on four different indictments, convicted on two, and sentenced to death.

On the 24th, he rode to Tyburn, performed his devotions, and was hung in the usual way. When he had been suspended fully fifteen minutes, there was a murmer in the distant crowd, that gradually grew into an excited shout of "Reprieve, reprieve!" The mob divided into two parts, a horseman, waving a broad paper, dashed up to the gibbet: Smith was reprieved. The mob instantly cut the rope, caught the man in their arms, bore him into the nearest house, and bled him till he slowly recovered.

When he perfectly regained his senses, he was asked what were his feelings at the time of execution, to which he replied: "That when he was turned off, he, for some time, was sensible of very great pain, occasioned by the weight of his body, and felt his spirits in a strange commotion, violently pressing upwards; that having forced their way to his head, he, as it were, saw a great blaze, or glaring light, which seemed to go out at his eyes with a flash, and then he lost all sense of pain. That after he was cut down, and began to come to himself, the blood and spirits, forcing themselves into their former channels, put him, by a sort of pricking or shooting, to such intolerable pain that he could have wished those hanged who had cut him down."

After this narrow escape, Smith pleaded for pardon and was discharged. He was always after known among the London thieves and constables as "Half-Hanged Smith."

The old ties were, however, too strong; again he got on the road, and was found tampering with other people's doors. He was soon after again tried at the Old Bailey for house-breaking, but the jury being uncertain, and leaving it to the twelve judges. Smith was eventually acquitted. Fortune was never tired of rescuing this rogue, surely born under a lucky star, for, at a third trial, he obtained his liberty by the sudden death of the prosecutor.

Such escapes were not very uncommon before the new drop rendered death inevitable when the bolt was once drawn. In 1740, a man named Dewell, who had been hung, came to life on the dissecting-table at Surgeon's Hall, and in consideration of this was, on his recovery, only transported. There is an Edinburgh story of an old woman who recovered, after hanging, from the jolting of the cart that was taking her to the churchyard. There was a thief at Dublin, too, who was recovered after being hung, and who had the boundless audacity to appear in the Ormand Quay Theater the same night, and hoarsely, but boastingly, report the fact to the delighted "boys" in the gallery.

III. THE PRESS-ROOM AT NEWGATE.

On the 1st of November, 1720, two highwaymen, named Spiggott and Phillipps, with three companions, all in masks, stopped the Wendover waggon, near Tyburn. The thieves tumbled the boxes out of the waggon, carried off the portmanteau of a Buckinghamshire gentleman, knocked the waggoner down, and one of them, who came on foot, rode off with a pack-horse. The portmanteau contained a gold watch, twelve Holland shirts, two pairs of laced ruffles, four turnovers, two cambric bossoms, two pair of stockings, a hat, a periwig, and twelve guineas. A Mr. Merrit and some officers instantly assisted the disconsolate carrier, and hid themselves in an inn in the Broadway, Westminster, where the highwaymen were in the habit of coming to hire horses. Spiggott, Phillipps, and a third man came into the stable for horses about ten o'clock in the morning. Merrit and his men instantly closed on them. A man named Rowlet fell on Spiggott, tripped up his heels, and scuffled with him for nearly half an hour. The highwaymen fired two pistols, and shot Rowlet through the shoulder. Spiggott was trying to draw his sword, and had got it half out. A constable, named Bryan, snatched the sword and thrust at Spiggott, but missed him, and ran a butcher through the leg. Spiggott swore he would kill a thousand of them before he would be taken; but eventually more men tumbled on him, and he gave up his sword and cried, "I've done." Phillips presented a musketoon at Hill, the constable, but fortunately it only flashed in the pan.

The men were instantly identified by John Watkins, a Monmouth carrier. They had stopped his pack horses on the 12th of November, at Bishop's Grove, on Hounslow-heath. Spiggott had clapped a pistol to his breast, bade him stand, and swore if Watkins did not tell which horse the money was on, he would kill them all. Phillips, in the mean time, drove off a pack-horse with goods valued at two hundred and fifty pounds. A gentleman named Sybbald also deposed to Spiggott and two other men having stolen fifteen guineas from him on the 25th of August, on Finchley common. One of them had the cape of his coat buttoned up over his chin, and the other kept the ends of his long wig in his mouth, for disguise. One of them secured his servant; the others held pistols on either side of him, made him dismount, and turned his horse loose on the common.

At the bar, Spiggott and Phillips declared they would not plead till their horses, furniture, and money were returned to them. As they continued to obstinately "stand mute," and refuse to plead to their indictment, they were at once ordered to be pressed to death—a cruel and inhuman punishment, worthy only of the Inquisition, and long since abolished. The executioner tied their thumbs together. In the press-room, Phillips consented to plead; but Spiggott was determined to save his effects for his family, and to escape the ignominy of the gallows. The ordinary of Newgate earnestly endeavored to dissuade the highwayman from thus hastening his own death and shortening the little time left for repentance, but Spiggott only replied:

"If you come to take care of my soul, good; but if you come about my body, I must be excused, for I won't hear one word."

Spiggott was then stretched on the stone floor of the dim room of torture, his feet bare, his face covered with a light cloth. His arms and legs were widened out, and fastened by cords to either side of the wall. The doctor was summoned, and while the turnkeys were clanking the weights into a heap, ready for use, the miserable wretch was legally informed that as much stone or iron as he could bear, "and more," would be placed upon him till he consented to plead. The first day he would be given three morsels of barley bread, but no drink; the second day three gulps of any water (not running water;) and this would be his diet till he died, after which his goods would be all forfeited to the king.

But he would not plead; so they began to pile him with masses of iron, till three hundred and fifty pounds weight rose in a ponderous pyramid upon his chest. The poor wretch lay sometimes silent, as if insensible of pain; then again he would fight for life, and fetch his breath quick and short. The chaplain, more merciful than the jailer, knelt and prayed by his side, and several times asked him why he would hazard his soul by such obstinate self-murder. The only answer Spiggott ever made was to murmer faintly:

"Pray for me! pray for me!"

There was something touching in the fact that the unhappy creature frequently complained of the podigious weight laid upon his face, though there was really only a light cloth, purposely left hollow. It was supposed that the blood forced into the brain and veins of the face caused this horrible sensation. After half an hour of this agony, the jailers increased the weight fifty pounds more, so that there was now four hundred-weight on his chest. Then, with the life slowly pressing from him, Spiggott at last groaned to take it off, and he would plead. Instantly the cords were cut, and the weights removed; the man was raised by two turnkeys, some brandy was put to his mouth, and he was carried, pale and almost insensible, to the court to take his trial. He remained for two days faint and almost speechless. Then he recovered a little strength, but relapsed, and expressed a wish to receive the sacrament, thinking he should not live till execution-day. He afterwards rallied somewhat, and attended prayers in the chapel twice a day.

This intrepid man had no reasons for bearing this torture except a wish to prevent his goods from being forfeited. He did not wish his children to be reproached with his death, and he desired, above all things, that the informer Lindsey might not boast of having sent him to Tyburn. He was especially incensed against Lindsey, whom he had once rescued from death at the peril of his own life, and got wounded in the struggle.

Spiggott would sometimes wish he had died in the press; for just before he was taken out, he had fallen into a stupor of benumbed sleep, and had hardly any sense of pain left. At other times he rejoiced that he had still time left for repentance. He was the son of an ostler at Hereford, he was twenty-nine years old, a cabinet maker by profession, and had three children living. He said he could not remember ever shedding tears but once in his life, and that was when he parted from his little boy in Newgate.

Phillips, his companion, was a Bristol sailor, and some years older. He had served in the Dover man-of-war, under Admiral Byng (not the unfortunate scapegoat of a blundering government), and had fought in several actions against the Spaniards. He was a wicked, audacious, obdurate villain, took a pride in recounting his villanies, and used to boast how he and Spiggott had robbed a hundred passengers from different waggons in one night, and left them bound in a row upon the road.

He derided the ordinary, swore and cursed when the other men were at prayers, and shouted ribald ballads when they sang Sternhold and Hopkins' psalms. He would not suffer any one to read or pray, or even look serious, and especially tormented poor Spiggott, his friend, by beating out his candles and rattling his irons when he went to prayers. The more devout the others got, the worse he became, beating and kicking them up and down the condemned cell. The prisoners at last entreated that he might be removed from them. He remained obstinate to the last, saying under the very gallows "that he did not fear to die, for he was in no doubt of going to heaven."

Spiggott owned to about a hundred highway robberies, chiefly on Hounslow-hearth and the Kingston and Ware roads. He said he did not desire to live; for since his punishment he could hardly breathe, and he should only drag through life a weak and unhealthy man. Both men were executed at Tyburn on the 8th of February, 1723.

IV. GALLOPING DICK.

The chief interest about this man is, that his career exemplifies the system of confederation between highwaymen and postboys that led to so many of the robberies on the road. Richard Ferguson, alias Galloping Dick, was the son of a gentleman's servant in Hertfordshire, and was brought up as as stable-boy, and subsequently as postilion at an inn in Piccadilly. There he become drunken, dissolute, and abandoned. Getting acquainted with highwaymen, they soon began to bribe him to give information at Abershaw's rendezvous of the times of chaises' starting, and when travelers with money were likely to pass. When driving post chaise between Hounslow and London, he had afterwards daily to drive past the gibbet where his old companion, Abershaw, hung jingling in chains. He seems to have lived for some years partly as a driver and spy, and partly as a highwaymen. One of his greatest robberies was the stopping the East Grinstead waggon at Brixton-causeway—he and six others. Dick's skill in managing horses led him always to choose a nag fit for a quick retreat; for Dick was prudent as well as brave. On one occasion, he and two others stopped and robbed two gentleman on the Edgeware road, but three other gentlemen riding up soon after, the five together gave hot pursuit, and Dick's two companions were run down, and soon afterwards tried and executed. When his associates complimented Dick on his rapid retrograde movement, he boasted that he could gallop a horse with any man in the kingdom. Henceforward he acquired the nickname of "Galloping Dick." He was repeatedly at Bow-street, but always succeeded in getting clear; at last some Bow-street patrols caught him in 1800, and sent him to Aylesbury for trial.

When left for execution, Dick decorously prepared himself for death, and made his ending with considerable resolution and penitence.

We have already shown that there was little romance and less chivalry about these vermin of the roads. They were not at all like that gallant gentleman in square-cut scarlet coat, gold-lace hat cocked awry, high black boots, and little light fetters that tinkle playfully like watch-chains all over him, who sits on the edge of a table in the Beggar's Opera, and sings about the "heart of a man" in that aunty devil-may care way that only stage tenors can assumo. They were much more like that grim, broken-down old rogue in Hogarth's picture of the gambling-house, who mopes over his losses by the fire, unconscious even of the glass of strong waters proffered him by the blackguard boy of the house. You see the brass butt of a horse pistol peeping out of his pocket. Well, its owner, before midnight, will be stopping a coach at Hounslow or Finchley, and perhaps in a week more will be swinging on a gibbet somewhere down the great north road.

The fact is, the life was a degraded, hopeless, bad, and scurvy one. There was no room for brave men in it. A coach was seldom stopped unless the assailants preponderated in force. They stripped the poor carrier and frightened countrywomen as soon as the rich grazier or the portly country squire. Half the bag of guineas they got was spent on Jew dealers, who charged three hundred per cent for bartering stolen plate, which the highwaymen could not otherwise turn into money. The thief taker always knew where to have these poor rascals when they refused to pay their black mail, or became worth a good reward. Not one man among them, not one, from 1660 to 1800, ever earned a name for remarkable courage.

—Charles Dickens' Magazine.

THE TOWER OF BABEL.—A writer in Blackwood's Magazine thus describes the present appearance of the place where languages got mixed: "After a ride of nine miles, we were at the foot of the Bier's Nimrood. Our horses' feet were trampling upon the remains of brick, which showed here and there through the accumulated dust and rubbish of ages. Before our eyes uprose a great mound of earth, barren and bare. This was Bier-Nimrood, the ruins of the Tower of Babel, by which the first builders of the earth had vainly hoped to scale high heaven. Here, also, it was, that Nebuchadnezzar built, for bricks, bearing his name, have been found in the ruins. At the top of the mound a great mass of brickwork pierces the accumulated soil. With your finger you touch the very bricks—large, square-shaped, and massive—that were "thoroughly" burned; the very mortar, the "slime," now hard as granite, handled more than four thousand years ago by earth's impious people. From the summit of the mound, far away over the plain, we could see glistening, brilliant as a star, the gilded dome of a mosque, that caught and reflected the bright rays of the morning sun' This glittering speck was the tomb of the holy Ali. To pray before this at some period of his life; to kiss the sacred dust of the earth around there, at some time or other; to bend his body and count his beads—is the daily desire of every devout Mahommedan."

THE SWEET USES OF ADVERSITY.—You wear out your old clothes. You are not troubled with many visitors. You are exonerated from making calls. Bores do not bore you. Spongers do not hurt your table Tax gatherers hurry past your door. Itinerant bands do not play opposite your door. You avoid the nuisance of serving on juries. You are not persecuted to stand as god-father. No one thinks of presentfng you with a testimonial. No clerk irritates you by asking, "Is there any one elso, to-pay sir?" Begging letter-writers leave you alone. Imposters know it is useless to bleed you. You practice temperance. You swallow infinitely less poison than others. Flatterers do not shoot their rubbish into your ear. You are saved many a debt, many a deception, many a headache. You are afforded the chance of consulting the biography of great men and struggles, and drawing from, them vauable lessons. Aud lastly, if you have a true friend in the world, you are sure, in a very short space of time, to learn it.

THE RAINING TREE.—The island of Fierro, (Iron,) is one of the largest in the Canary Group, and it has received its name on account of its iron-bound soil, through which no river or streams flow. It has also but very few wells, and these not very good. But the great Preserver and Sustainer of all remedies this inconvenience in a way so extraordinary that man will be forced to acknowledge that he gives in this an undeniable demonstration of his wonderful goodness. In the midst of the island there grows a tree, the leaves of which are long and narrow, and continue in constant verdure winter and summer, and the branches are covered with a cloud which is never dispelled, bnt resolving itself into a moisture, causes to fall from its leaves a very clear water, in such abundance that cisterns placed at its foot to receive it are never empty.

ITS MERITS.—Mrs. Charlotte D. Watts, wife of Dr. Robert Watts, of the city of New York, gives the following as her experience with Sewing Machines, "I have had several years experience with a Grover & Baker Machine, which has given me great satisfaction. Its chief merit is that it makes a strong elastic stitch; it is very easily kept in order, and worked without much fatigue, which I think is a very great recommendation. I am not very familiar with any other machine, except a Wheeler & Wilson, which I have had. I think the Grover & Baker Machine is more easily managed, and less liable to get out of order. I prefer the Grover & Baker decidedly."

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

TRANSFORMATIONS OF CHRISTIANITY.

In last week's CALIFORNIAN, we made mention at some length, of a rather remarkable book, entitled "Liber Librorum, in which an attempt is made to establish a rational and philosophical theory of the inspiration of the Scriptures, which shall not involve the theory of a literal or verbal inspiration. The "First Historical Transformations of Christianity," by Athanase Coquerel the younger, translated from the French by Professor Evans of the University of Michigan, is another theological work which may be classed, so far as its independent and progressive spirit is concerned, with such books as "Ecce Homo," and "Ecce Deus," though differing from them in its special subject. Coquerel the younger, belongs to the liberal school of French Protestants, and shares many of the doctrines of that section of the American Unitarians that is in closest sympathy with the so-called evangelical sects, besides rejecting the dogma of eternal punishment.

CHRISTIANITY CONTINUALLY DEVELOPING.

The writer also maintains that theology is progressive instead of being fixed and unchangeable. On this point he says:

"In short, it is impossible to deny that Christianity, even in its most authoritative form, developes unceasingly, and, like everything else, either progresses or retrogrades. History asserts this fact beyond all dispute; and to the question whether Christianity is capable of transformation, it is enough to reply that it has been transformed in every age, and is being transformed in our very presence.

Even the idea of revelation contains nothing contrary to that which we here set forth. All truth, however divine it may be, is developed in two ways, which are essentially one—by purifying constantly the human element which it necessarily contains, and freeing itself from them: by bearing its own fruits, by bringing to light its ligitimate consequences, and giving itself up to them more completely. No truth is sterile.

It may be asked what was Jesus' thought on this point; but the answer cannot be doubtful. No one ever made a bolder appeal to free conscience than he. No one ever said to the human mind with a more intrepid trust in the truth, "Seek and ye shall find." This intermingling of extreme boldness with infinite tenderness for troubled souls, is a distinctive characteristic of Jesus. He opens to investigation the realm of the infinite, and shows high respect for the illimitable rights of thought in the pursuit of the true; but at the same time that he displays a sublime confidence in the power of truth and in the aptitude of the human soul for knowing and loving it, he appreciates with infinite delicacy the anguish, the misery, the modesty, the holy ambition of the human heart. He sows in the minds of men, and then leaves them to nourish the grain in its deep furrow. All individualities have their legitimate career. No uniform yoke, no dry and rigid rule, is imposed upon them. Thus never did burning wax receive its impress so easily and faithfully as Christian truth has assimilated to all characters, all races, all epochs.

Not only is it a fact that there are as many Christianities as Christians, but Jesus has taken great care and pains that it should be so. See him, with a tender and watchful solicitude, defending every spontaneous expression of love and of faith, against the orthodox rigidity of the Jews, and the narrowness of his own disciples. He made others feel at ease with him; and while many times a great character has levelled all who surrounded him, and imparted to them his own tint, the two Johns, Peter, Martha, and Mary, preserved the full originality of their natures, the free diversity of their characters.

Did he ever speak of his religion as of a finished doctrine, of his gospel as of what is called a closed protocol? Never. The figures by which he constantly represents the Christian life, the reign of God in us, and the destinies of his church, are borrowed from living nature; the germination of vegetation; the good grain which grow mingled with tares; the little seed which becomes a great tree; the fruit ripening on the branch; the leaven which ferments and expands the whole lump; the living water becoming a fountain, and springing up into eternal life; the fire which diffuses itself; the money well invested, which increases by accumulated interest and by labor.

In the Gospel according to St. John he announces, several times and in various ways, the future developments of his doctrine. He declares to his disciples, on the eve of his death, that he has yet many things to say unto them, but that they cannot bear them now; he repeats to them that the Spirit, the Comforter (Paraclete), will teach them things which, as yet, they are ignorant of. He astonishes the Twelve by these solemn and profound words: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on me, the works that I do he shall do also, and greater works than these shall he do; because I go unto my Father," It seems to us impossible to express more boldly than in these formal and frequent declarations the eminently progressive character of Christianity.

The contrast is striking between so many religions which pretend from the first day to have said all, and the Christian religion, which never ceases to impel souls onward and upward in the knowledge of the truth.

This is why Jesus, comprehending in its height and totality the future of the reign of God, did not bind it to any form, or code, or creed, which, in order to be intelligible and admissible, would have to bear the transient and local impress of circumstances. He reserved, with a constant solicitude, all the progress and freedom of the future. Consequently, whoever pretends to freeze and fix under a given form the inexhaustible current of Christian life and truth, is in direct opposition to the will of the Master and to that improvement, without other limit than the divine perfection, which is the very essence of Christianity."

DIFFERENCES AMONG THE APOSTLES.

"It is incontestible that, during the life of the apostles, the church was divided, not in respect to secondary questions, but on the vital question of the age: it is incontestible that James was disturbed and hurt by the liberalism of Paul, that he sent emissaries to do over again his work in the churches, and that he expressly refuted his positions in a letter addressed to all Christians.

What was St. Peter doing all this while? the Catholics will ask. Was it not for him, prince of the apostles and pope, to re-establish order among the chiefs of the church? Here are the facts: Peter was in no respect superior to his colleagues, and had no kind of jurisdiction over them. In the question under consideration his reason was in favor of Paul, while his feebleness of character leaned toward James. He allowed Mosaic obligations to be imposed upon his own disciples, and through complacency submitted to them himself. Paul was then at Antioch, where Peter soon arrived; Paul was a witness of what was taking place, and became indignant; he did not treat his colleague very gently; he accused him openly of dissimulation, and of not walking uprightly. It is he himself who relates it. "But when Peter was come to Antioch, I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed. For before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles; but when they were come, he withdrew and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision [the Judaizing Christians]. And the other Jews dissembled likewise with him; insomuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation. But when I saw that they walked not uprightly according to the truths of the gospel, I said unto Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of the Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?"

On this memorable occasion Peter is the representative of those men of compromise, who, for the sake of peace, make concessions contrary to the truth and to their consciences, and who deserve to be energetically rebuked by men of principle."

PAUL AND CALVIN.

M. Coquerel does not hesitate to criticise the various apostles in much the same style in which he would speak of modern theological writers. He tells us that certain mental idiosyncrasies of Paul, together with the character of the polemics of his time, "led him to adopt the doctrine of election and predestination—a cruel doctrine, which Calvin has rendered yet more cruel." But he adds by way of apology for the apostle of the Gentiles:

"Let us not be scandalized beyond measure at an opinion so shocking to our conscience; this opinion itself was then a considerable progress. A Pharisee was persuaded, from his childhood, that of all the human race, only Israelites faithful to the law could be saved, that, admitted by God to the banquet of honor eternally presided over by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. This same Pharisee had a great step to make in advance, in the sense of charity and spirituality, in order to allow that God would remain free to admit to this supreme glory impure Gentiles, despised and abhorred Samaritans. This same dogma which galls us as stained with a revolting partiality, seemed to half-emancipated Jews an excess of impartiality hard to be accepted.

Paul, proclaiming the divine arbitrariness on the ruins of the Israelitic monopoly, reminds us of the communes of the middle ages, which thought to have gained everything when they were able to substitute for the burdensome privileges of their feudal lords the absolute power of one remote king. It became evident, with time, that arbitrariness is neither good nor just anywhere; in politics, because it is contrary to the rights of all; in religion, because it wounds at once the conscience of man and the holiness of God."

CERTAIN LONDON CELEBRITIES.

Professor Hopkins' "Old England, Its Scenery, Art and People," recently published, contains among other things, a variety of highly interesting popular sketches of distinguished men, including Gladstone, Disraeli, John Bright, Spurgeon, F. D. Maurice, the friend of Tennyson, Henry Melville and others. Some of these sketches are slight and off-hand, while others are full and elaborate. Of Lord Palmerston, the writer says: "He carried a bold air, and in the broad and racy expression of his face looked like the born Irishman. He seemed to have the elasticity of immortal youth. It was highly interesting to hear this inimitable veteran debater roll off his easy and stereotyped phrases of defence, now rising into stately rhetoric, now getting up in immense indignation, now casting himself back on his official dignity, and now darting mingled ridicule and power into the weak place of his opponent's armor." Lord John Russell is described as having "a pompous way of speaking for a small man," but ingenious in "gliding oilily around a difficulty, and an imperious way of trampling it down when he cannot answer it." Of Disraeli, he says:

"His head, from the distance where I sat, appeared not unlike Webster's though of far less massive mould; perhaps it was his saturnine complexion and imperturbable countenance, that gave me this impression. His dark features and black hair, contemplative and even sombre expression, single him out among all. He is a stranger there. Although his spirit may not be wholesome, and his eloquence is often more brilliant than sound, he has dared to raise above the dead level practical standard of English debate into a new world of ideas and principles, and to discuss subjects in a more comprehensive and philosophical way."

The personal appearance of John Bright, and his style of speaking, are thus described:

"He has a round, full forehead, and a large, resolute mouth, but the expression seemed to me gentler and more refined than I had imagined of this strong popular tribune. He looks like a good man—a man whose heart, whose moral nature predominates over and subordinates his intellect. You get just the reverse of this idea, I think, from the face of Gladstone, who is pure intellect, though he has shown that he possesses a noble heart."

"Bright's speech was characterized by straightforward plainness, and also by singular force of condensed scholarly expression. There was none of the drawing mannerism of the other speakers, but a marching right on in a free, fresh, direct current of remark. There seemed to me a consciousness that he was the leader of a growing power in the State, and was bound to say something 'telling' and strong."

THE LONDON PULPIT—SPUROEON—MELVILLE—F. D. MAURICE.

Professor Hopkins' description of Spurgeon, the famous dissenting pulpit orator, will surprise those who have considered him to belong to the coarser type of the impassioned and fervid evangelical pulpit declaimer. Here it is:

"Mr. Spurgeon's personal appearance is too well known to need description. He has a blacksmith's frame, and a ruddy face, glowing with health and good nature. It is a good face, with great purity of expression, and at times it shines with a kind of celestial radiance.

"The first element of his power in his preaching (not to mention those higher and secret helps which God gives the true preacher of his Word) is undoubtedly his earnestness. No one can doubt that his one great purpose is to serve his Master and bring men into his kingdom. He shoots every shaft in his quiver with a well aimed, inflexible intent to transfix the conscience. There was nothing in his Paris visit to show that he was displaying himself, but he evidently bent himself to the work of awakening Christians to a higher life, and pleasure-seekers to thought and repentance. Then his fluency. This quality may be said to be unrivalled in his case. It seems as easy for him to speak as to breathe. He preaches without notes, with never a stop or break, or ill-made sentence. In the easy, continuous flow of his speech, the hearer's mind floats along upon it with hardly a consciousness of the speaker, which is always a delight. Then again his voice. He has a regal voice, with youthful tones still in it. It is an "organe très agréable" as a French gentleman sitting before me remarked. It is loud without ever losing its roundness and sweetness. Also his practicalness We have said that his style of preaching was exceeding simple and objective. It would not be considered sufficiently logical or philosophical (in a true sense) for an American congregation. He does not reason profoundly and avoids the speculative side of the truth. Yet there is substance and soul travail in his sermons. They are not devoid of a certain kind of logic. He does not leave his hearers with a mass of crude matter, but is careful as to the orderly development of truth. Yet every thing he says is for immediate effect. It is pointed to the present instant. His preaching abounds in well-told facts—in close, apt ringing bits of human experience that clench the important and perhaps unwelcome truth He has the Luther temperament, that delights in pithy sayings, and stories that penetrate into the springs of action, let them be even odd and laughable. And his dramatic talent. This we have spoken of. He is a native orator, knowing how to handle his arms, his feet, his head, his eyes; and the subtle faculty all men perceive, if they cannot comprehend and describe it. Above all his goodness. This shines out from him. He looks kind, friendly, frank and sympathetic. Let him say what he will, he wins esteem, confidence, love. He has no cant and long facedness, though he shows himself tremulously in earnest. He has a big, warm heart, a sunny conscience, and a pure, simple Christ like spirit.

Of Henry Melville, our author says he had conceived as "Thin, worn with thought, but with classic features and spiritual brow, and with the voice of a silver trumpet. He was calm and peaceful, like a deep river, but rolling along rich burdens of thought." But instead of this ideal, he found him "a grizzle haired athlete," a "brusque old gentleman, with sanguine manners, and a voice like a November storm." In the Rev. F. D. Maurice, he met with a similar disappointment. "He is a short man, with piercing black eyes, very pleasant face, but worn and scholar-like, and with a thoughtful pensiveness of expression. The loved brother in law of Sterling, the friend of Arch-Deacon Hare, of Kingsley and Tennyson, he must have an attaching and stimulating power; but he does not show it in the pulpit. His delivery was artificial, almost sing-song in tone, and by no means distinct: and his style was altogether too high pitched and essayish to reach a common audience." Still, the writer declares, that Maurice wields in England an indefinable influence, and is liked for "his manliness, his progressive capacity, and his whole sympathy with the religious doubts and difficulties of men."

Though many of Professor Hopkins' incidental criticisms and off-hand opinions of artists, literary men, and their productions, seem a little old fashioned, it cannot be denied that he has given us a pleasant and thoroughly enjoyable book. Few tourists have succeeded in giving us so faithful a picture of England from Land's End to Tweedmouth. Nearly every county was visited, and the reader may be tolerably sure to find some appreciative notice of what is most noticeable in each. The writer seems to have an especial taste for architecture, and he has bestowed a great deal of attention on the old cathedrals, which constitute the architectural glory of England.

A TRIP TO PESCADERO.

SEATED in the San Jose cars, on a beautiful morning three weeks since, we listened with quiet satisfaction to the rush and whirl of the car wheels as they left the city in the dim distance, and gazed with a feeling of relief upon the moving panorama of hills, valleys and trees. One hour's travel brought us to San Mateo.

Impelled by that spirit of ambition which is the traveling characteristic of the American people, the cars had scarcely stopped before we started for an outside seat on the Pescadero stage; unfortunately, however, we learned the sad lesson of itinerancy, that stage drivers are magnates, a seat by whom is an honor for which every traveler is an eager aspirant, for having lost a second of time in casting a prudential glance at our baggage, we discovered three energetic individuals perching themselves upon the desired locality.

The road to Pescadero is interesting, attractive and picturesque. Leaving San Mateo it winds around People's Park, and then running to Crystal Springs, leads you under rustic arches, down into glens where tiny streams of water, whose ripples, full of sympathy, pursue their sinuous course sparkling through the brush, now coursing swiftly along over rocks and pebbles, beneath the shade of overhanging foliage, then rushing into the sunshine till every drop seemed a particle of molten silver.

Beyond Crystal Springs, we traveled over a level country, through avenues formed on the one side of brush, on the other of buckeyes, whose sweet-smelling blossoms diffuse an aroma like the honeysuckle, the road, leading gradually up a mountain, from the summit of which the view is grand in the extreme. Below was the valley, whose fertility and beauty might rival the Hesperides; beyond, in rigid grandeur, that strongly contrasted with the cultivated fields beneath, loomed the Mountains of the Coast Range, and, further on, the ocean, covered with a mantle of mist. Lingering a moment on the summit, the descent commences with the cool air of the mountain blowing freshly in your face, you dash along on a newly graded road, over green sward, through brooks, under trees, across rustic bridges, sweeping grandly around curves that seem to lead over the precipitous bank, sensibly impressing you by their abruptness with the consequences that would follow an error of your driver, and yet adventurously confident in his skill, you go riding down the grand old mountain, and almost feel a pang of sorrow when at its feet you reach the level road leading to Half Moon Bay. At this place, reached about 11½ o'clock, the passengers dine, the repast, ordinarily occupying about twenty minutes, a time sufficiently long to stay in Half Moon Bay. Two hours ride, next brings you to the San Gregario creek, a locality, which we can testify from ocular evidence, to be an excellent place for fishing. Upon the banks of this creek, the disciples of Walton delight to ambush themselves, and fishing rods having their inception in brush, and their terminus in a fly of variegated plumage, may be seen all along the creek. The scenery here at once stamps it a piscatorial paradise; the water runs swiftly along channels, now rippling around the branches of a fallen tree now coursing beneath the shadow of an overhanging rock, dashing over the pebbles, now sparkling for a moment where a narrow streak of sunshine pierces the foliage; again dark as the Styx where it settles in some rocky hole or basin of the stream. There, the metropolitan finds himself emancipated, indeed, as he stands on the banks of the creek, beneath the shadow of its trees and foliage, with naught to disturb the silence save the murmurs and ripple of the stream.

Leaving the San Gregario, an hour's ride over a dusty road, brought us to our destination. Pescadero, or to use a tourist's expressive abbreviation, Pesky, is decidedly a country place; it is situated in a valley about one mile from the coast, with a climate somewhat similar to that of San Francisco, save that it is better protected by its mountains and hills. When you reach the summit of the hill which overlooks "Pesky," a close scrutiny and observation reveals to you the following objects: first, a flag pole, next a roof, then a two-story frame house, which you are assured is the hotel, whereof you are at first skeptical; then another house looms up, likewise a hotel, and then six more edifices which you rashly infer to be hotels also.

Immediately after our arrival at Scranton's, about 2 P. M., not discovering any object of particular interest, we started for the Pescadero Creek, which we were informed was about three hundred yards distant; now, had we reflected for a moment, we might have properly realized the unsatisfactory character of the above information, but considering that the house was the initial point from which the distance was computed, we trudged along quite contentedly for the first 200 yards, when discovering nothing ahead save a long, well-defined expanse of road, we pushed forward anxiously for 150 yards further, but observing no material change in the prospect, we settled down into a spirit of dejected resolve, and after having traversed a mile and a half, we were rewarded by reaching the creek. This stream empties into the ocean, and affords excellent opportunities for colliding with fences and running upon mud banks. But notwithstanding these little drawbacks, we enjoyed many a pleasant hour during our stay, boating on Pescadero Creek. While the appearance of Pescadero is calculated to convey to the traveler a vivid impression of Sleepy Hollow, the facilities it affords for picnics, excursions and social intercourse, unite to make it one of best places for pleasure, freedom and jolity that a party of tourists can desire. All visitors here seem naturally to throw off the restraints and formalities of city life, and devote themselves entirely to vigorous and sanitary modes of enjoyment. Horse-back riding is a favorite exercise, while we have frequently seen ladies of the highest social culture and refinement, industriously rowing up and down the creek, and although on these occasions the boat pursued a somewhat devious course, shooting obliquely upon a mud bank, or running with misdirected accuracy into the centre of a pile, we could not but admire the spirit exhibited.

Among one of the many pleasant places we visited while in Pescadero, was Redwood Glen. The road to this place leads for some distance along the coast. and is grand indeed, running close to cliffs, from whose majestic heights we look down upon the ocean and its foam-capped waves, dashing high upon the beach and covering the rocks with clouds of spray. At the Glen, we behold redwood trees of magnificent proportions, so thick as to leave only a small clearing, where a mill has been erected. In the Glen we passed several hours, traversing under its splendid arches, or climbing over the fallen trees. till at length we seemed to have invaded the very depths of the forest, and it needed no vivid imagination to conjure up in the dark circles of this splendid cathedral of nature, some old Druid worshiping by his altar of stones, or fair Dryad decking her tresses with forest leaves. DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

SOME of our regular theater-goers profess to be astonished at the fact that Edwin Adams, an actor who came here comparatively unheralded, who arrived at the commencement of the dullest season of the year, when all our fashionable people are at watering places, should succeed in crowding Maguire's Opera House nightly for the last three weeks, and at present have a fair prospect of playing to crowded houses for three months at least. There is nothing so very strange in this fact, if the people will only reflect a little. Many a star who has visited this city has very soon lead out his trump card with the expectation that it would be sufficiently strong to win him the game. Bandman played "Narcisse" very well, but it could not run more than two or three consecutive nights in San Francisco. Vestvali played "Gamea," and exhibited genius in her impersonation of that character. Edwin Adams has played a most even game, if he has a bad card in his hand he has not as yet shown it. and he appears to be cautiously reserving his strongest trumps. That all our fashionable people have not left town, was abundantly proved on Monday, by the splendid audience which assembled to witness Edwin Adams' impersonation of "Jack Rover." A change was made in the cast on this occasion: Harry Edwards assumed the character of "Sir George Thunder," and played it in a manner which charmed every one. On Tuesday the house was thronged by persons wishing to witness the young tragedian's fine impersonation of "Hamlet," which has been pronounced by the Press generally, to be the most even performance of the part ever given in this city. Mr. Adams is not an actor by fits and starts, he never for an instant loses his identification with the character he is playing. and in this especially. lies the great charm of his acting. On Wednesday, Richard III was performed to an immense house. On Thursday night, the long promised drama of The Dead Heart, (Edwin Adams' original version) was produced. In spite of the attractions of the fire-works and numerous social gatherings the house presented its usual appearance—crowded from pit to dome. The Dead Heart has been reserved by Mr. Adams as a treat for his appreciative audiences. It was in this he made his first grand success. and no character could be better suited than is that of "Robert Landry" to show his talent to advantage. The plot of this piece is familiar to the public, it being the same as that of the piece played under the same name some years ago. Mr. Adams' play is one of the most thrilling dramas ever produced on the stage; it is full of dramatic situations; the dialogue is crisp and sparkling, and considerable opportunity is afforded for scenic effects. It was capitally put on the stage, and the correct manner in which even those who had not a line to speak acted their parts, evinced the fruits of frequent and careful rehearsals. I almost feel inclined to say, that in the character of "Robert Landry," Edwin Adams is seen at his best, but he may have something better still in reserve. The scene in which he is released from an imprisonment of seventeen years in the Bastile, is worked up in the most thrilling manner; the attempts of the freed captive to recover his memory and realize his position are admirably portrayed. Mr. Adams is famous for his combats, and worked his audience up to a pitch of painful excitement by his combat with "Abbé la Tour" in the fourth act. Mr. McCullough played the cool villain, "Abbé la Tour" extremely well, carefully avoiding exaggeration and preserving the sang froid which distinguishes the character, with great skill. The death scene was especially well managed. Mrs. Sophie Edwin was quite at home in the character of "Catherine Duval," and played it in such a manner that she gained the sympathies of the audience at the beginning, and retained them throughout the play. She read the many fine passages which fell to her with much force, and gained great applause. J. A. Herne was very good as "Count St. Valarie," and "St. Valarie, Jr." Miss Sallie Hinckley played the part of "Ciresette," with immense spirit, and did not miss making a single point. Harry Edwards was a very fine characterization of the bearish but soft-hearted patriot. Altogether The Dead Heart was admirably well performed, and should enjoy a long run. This fine play was presented yesterday evening and will be repeated to-night. To resume the metaphor which I adopted at the commencement, Mr. Adams appears to consider that he holds a good hand in hearts, and will play another of this suit for his benefit on Monday night. He will appear in the favorite drama of The Marble Heart. That the young tragedian will have a bumper benefit is certain; the number of his admirers is very large, he is supported by no nationality, by no clique, but by the general public who acknowledge his genius.

At the Metropolitan Theater, a season of comedy, burlesque, opera, and farce commenced on Monday, under the direction of Miss Emma Howson with Frank Howson as Manager. The performance opened with an operetta entitled Mephistopheles Jr; or an Ambassador from Below. The whole of the music introduced in this piece was original, having been composed by F. A. Howson. The duet "Two Little Hands, Two Little Hearts" was very pretty; the duet between "Brancador" and "Fiametta," "Here's my Wife, so you must Leave Me," was a really fine composition, and the finale "Good Night, Signor Mephistopheles," evinced considerable talent. Why does not Frank write an English opera? The chief parts in the play, "Pepito," "Honesta" and "Mephistopheles" fell to Miss Clelia Howson, who performed them admirably. At the commencement of the play her impersonation of the good young "Pepito," the gardener, was capital, and the change which took place in his feelings when Mephistopheles entered into him was most artistically represented. Her impersonation of "Honesta" was equally good, and the transformation of the timid, blushing bride into the virago was a very fine piece of acting. As "Mephistopheles," in the concluding scene, Miss Clelia Howson was, indeed, a very jolly little devil, and quite won the hearts of her audience. The entertainment concluded with the clever burlesque of Atalanta, in which Miss Emma Howson appeared to great advantage in the title role, acting and singing in the most charming manner. John Howson was wonderfully funny as "Missisarris," as indeed he is in all burlesque old-women parts. Mis Jennie Parker made a handsome "Hippomenes," and the cast was altogether a good one. This famous burlesque will be played for the last time this afternoon. This evening, the performance will commence with Charles Mathew's favorite comedietta Who Speaks First? and conclude with the ever-popular extravaganza of Aladdin; or, The Wonderful Scamp, in which Miss Clelia Howson made such an immense hit some months ago. This is one of the most attractive extravaganzas ever written, and the capital company at present at the Metropolitan Theater are fully capable to do it justice. John Howson's "Widow Twankey" is one of the most laughable impersonations ever presented on the stage.

Last night the beautiful opera of The Bohemian Girl was performed. I regret being unable to furnish an account of it in time for The Californian.

Every evening during the week, Henri Herberte has delighted the audience assembled in the Metropolitan Theatre, by singing "My Pretty Jane."

On Monday, Mrs. C. R. Saunders, the talented and popular comedienne, commences an engagement at this house, and the comedy of The Serious Family will be performed. The company, at the Metropolitan Theatre, is a strong one, comprising such comedy talent as Mrs. Saunders, Mr. Sinclair, Mr. Thompson, Mr. Leach, and the Howsons. The next opera to be produced is Der Freischutz, which will be presented on Friday.

The people of San Francisco are to have their second season of Italian Opera, in spite of their misbehavior in not rallying to the support of the Impresario. I commend to the perusal of those who fancy an Impresario has an easy task in providing operatic entertainments for their amusement, the article entitled "The Enterprising Impresario," on the tenth page of the present issue of the Californian. The subscription list of the new season, will be open on Monday morning, and on Wednesday next, the opera of Ione will be produced at the Academy of Music. As opera is provided for our citizens at a lower rate than in almost any other country in the world, it is absolutely necessary to secure the Impresario from heavy loss, that the house should be full every night. The new season offers so many attractions that we have but little fear as to the result. Touchstone.

FENIAN JAMES FITZPATRICK.

THE day's partial thaw is succeeded by a clear sharp frost to-night. A solemn stillness reigns over field and fell The very air is sleeping, and not a cloud flecks the great dome of heaven. All the expance is flooded with pale moonlight. The fir-trees, still bearing fleeces of snow in tiers upon their fan-like arms, cast grotesque shadows on the lawn. Three bright lines of light blaze in the barracks yonder on the hill. They keep the lights burning all the night through now, for there are few men within, and they are watching. A dog disturbed, barks sharply far away down in the valley, others of his kind take up and repeat his warning; for a moment there is a chorus of sharp terriers and deep-toned mastiffs, then all is till again. The silence saddens and oppresses one. All are asleep within, and I long for some sign of active life to break the grave stillness of the hour.

Yes, there is life. A mile away behind the house they are burning furze upon Knockrea. Yet these are not furze-burners, now that I look again. The light is too steady and too red. It must be just above the edge on which the police-station can be discerned, white above its own dark shadow. It is extinguished, and flashes out again. Once more I try to fix the spot where it appeared, once more it blazes out, and stronger than before. Is that an electric flash, marking out a bath of light among the trees, and glancing off the red-barked pine? Signal answers signal, as I live! They speak to each other across the gorge. those men upon the hill and some round my own homestead. All is still as death. but near me there are others awake, and watching like myself.

The stealthy drawing of a bolt, the rattling of a chain, the creak of a hinge upon the gate, and suddenly the clank of hoofs on the hard roadway. My horses are away! Have they broken loose, or are they ridden? I shout, and in reply hear from the skirt of the wood, horrible in the night's quiet, that demoniac war-hoop which James Fitzpatrick learned of the Indians. It is Fitzpatrick; he has thrown off the mask at last! Distant, ever more distant, is the clatter of the hoofs, now ringing more clearly as they mount hills, now dying away in the hollows. At last it is heard only at distant intervals, and then no more.

According to his own story, James Fitzpatrick had left Ireland three years before "the war." Wandering through "the States," doing a turn of work, now here, now there, he became a sort of slave-driver on a cotton-plantation in South Carolina. When the war between North and South broke out, he bore arms in the Confederate ranks, and fought at Beaufort and New Orleans under the Palmetto flag. Either as a deserter or a prisoner, he changed sides, and served with Sherman during his famous march from Atlanta to Charleston, and fearful were the tales he told to our frightened but eagerly listening children of blood, and death, and plunder he had seen. Leaving this service, too, he never told us how or why, he became "lifter" to a corn-merchant at Chicago—an employment for which his powerful and active frame well fitted him. He offered his services to me a few weeks after his return to Ireland "for any wages I pleased to give." I had just obtained a life interest in a small farm of twenty acres of ornamental wood. The place had been shamefully neglected, and my ignorance of farming was supreme. Fitzpatrick was recommended to me as a "handy man," ready to "put his strength" to any kind of labor, and such I found him.

His experience in "the territories" of America had taught him much. He was equal to three ordinary men in capacity for work and facility in expedients. He kneaded and baked our bread, cared and milked our cows, made our butter, did a trifle of blacksmith's work, repaired our gates and fences, and executed rough jobs of carpentry. We found out that he washed, clear-starched, and "did up fine things" as well as any laundry-maid. There was nothing he was not willing to attempt and could not manage to do in some way, so as to answer the purpose for a time. He soon brought our small farm "to rights" working himself energetically but noisily, and making others work. With our children he was all in all; their great authority and lawgiver in the art of constructing rabbit-hutches, setting snares for hares or birds, and building toy ships to sail upon the pond. He knew where the hawk had her young, and the woodquest built her nest. Great was the store of wild birds' eggs the boys gathered on the moor and "blew" under his direction. As a help he was invaluable to us, but there was a restlessness and wildness, sometimes a degree of violence, in his character which caused uneasiness. He spoke of our farm as his own, and openly said what he would have done next year; but the Irish steward identified himself so far with his master, that this occasioned no surprise. We knew not then that he had purchased an "Irish bond" on our small estate. He boasted more than once to other that "he could buy and sell us" if he pleased. One part of his character did give me real uneasiness. He hated, or professed to hate, the priests of his own communion. He forsook his "duty," seldom going to chapel never to confession. The language he ventured to use towards his own priest was unmeasured in abuse; yet the parish priest was a gentle aged man, kindly and charitable, never interfering in politics save to condemn the Fenians.

Early in the month of October, Fitzpatrick requested me to sign, in evidence of his identity, an American draft for one hundred and eighty dollars, drawn in his favor at New York This, he said, was the amount of his savings at Chicago, which he had left in bank until "gold got cheap." His account was not improbable, for I knew him to be hard working and thrifty. On the third Sunday of December he brought another note, but this time for two hundred and fifty dollars. I refused, but in quiet terms, to sign such a document on Sunday. A sudden fear flashed across my mind, for these American bills were objects of suspicion. I determined on the moment, come what would, to dismiss Fitzpatrick. On my refusal to sign the note his face grew purple, and he dashed from the room, more resembling a maniac than a sane man. On that night he fled.

There was no rest for the remainder of the night. We closed the yard-gates, bolted and barred the rooms below, and waited for winter's dawn. To send for the constabulary, I should leave the house to females and children. I should have to pass through the wood to reach the lodge; and who could tell whether the keeper was not in the plot? An hour passed away, and then came the tramp of men upon the gravel. They paused before the house. and the sound of grounded arms was plain. A short rapid glance from the window showed us the police. There were twelve in the patrol. Three and the sergeant a little in advance, faced the hall door full in the moonlight; two were dimly seen in the dark shadow of the trees on either side; the rest had mounted the yard gate, for we heard them moving on the pavement.

"Very sorry to disturb you, sir, but we have orders."

"Wait one moment, sergeant, I will let you in."

"We have a warrant, sir, against Fitzpatrick, which is his room?"

A few words sufficed to show that Fitzpatrick had known the warrant was issued almost as soon as the police themselves. The accurate and timely information possessed by the leading Fenians was sometimes a complete puzzle to the authorities. They seemed to know beforehand when and where, and in what force, a search would be made. The escape of Stephens from Richmond Bridewell was only one of a series of proofs that the conspiracy had active and unsuspected agents in offices of trust. Two, if not three, years had been spent by Stephens and his colleages in preparation. Efforts were made, often aided innocently by most loyal men, to obtain situations for confederates in prisons, hospitals, and public offices. There were confederates in the camps, in barrack, and in the neighborhood of police stations. The slightest movements on the part of the constabulary were noted by vigilant, but unseen or unsuspected watchers. A simple system of light signals by night, scouts on the tops of hills during the day, betrayed the line of route taken by military or police. The uncouth and silent peasant screening the sand on the mountain-side; the tramp who infested your grounds; the peddler with his "lucifers," and song books, and bits of showy ribbon; the laborer looking for work with his spade upon his shoulder; the ragged and shoeless urchin pretending to mind the sheep; the girl half hidden among the furze playing with her kid, were all scouts, well-paid scouts—for a trifle serves as a great bribe where the wages of a working man are but seven shillings weekly—doing the bidding of an unknown agent under pain of death. Chiefly the leaders sought to place confederates about the families of persons holding office under the crown. Any movement out of the routine course was suspected and watched. A sentence heard at the dinner-table, and most innocently mentioned in the kitchen, seemed to have wings. The purport of it, if it concerned the conspiracy, was known miles away before nightfall.

A search was made in the room so recently occupied by the fugitive. Little was found: a pair of military gloves, two copies of the Irish People—not the genuine Irish People suppressed by the government, but an American publication transmitted in quantities to Ireland, either separately or folded in the pages of other New York newspapers. A plank of the floor had been taken up, and lay on its side against the wall. Here, it was supposed, "the rifle" had been secreted. Bedding was tossed up and carefully examined, with no result. In passing down the stairs leading to the room, the lamp held by the sergeant flashed its light upon a paper affixed to the wall It was wafered up, and covered with short pencil strokes, opposite words written in ink. Under the words "Head," "Hands," "Fingers," "Feet," "Toes," were marks I did not comprehend. The sergeant knew at once the importance of the document. These names indicated the position held by members of the conspiracy. The "hands" were superior to the "feet," but both had authority. The "fingers" were the "privates" who had been supplied with arms. The "toes" were unarmed as yet. The down-strokes indicated the attendance at drill.

"There is evidence here to hang him, if he's caught," said the sergeant. "A document like this we do not often find."

So the very man whom we had, until lately, trusted most, and who was thoroughly acquainted with the whole tenor of our lives, was the chief organiser and paymaster of the Fenians in our district!

Before mid day on Monday we knew all. They, amongst whom we lived, and who never had uttered one word of warning, were voluble in offering information now Every one knew something about Fitzpatrick, and came to tell it. On holidays, or in the evenings after the hours of work, "our man" drilled his recruits among the sand hills, or seduced and swore men in at the cateen. He reviewed his levies and distributed pay, on starry nights, at the hedges of the moor. Now was explained why we often heard the sound of horses' hoofs so late at night, and why our ponies appeared exhausted and spiritless in the morning.

Five arrests were made early in the morning of Fitzpatrick's flight. Two publicans, who had a thriving trade, disappeared, without informing their nearest relatives why, or whither—at least, so they said. The whole district was in commotion, and every laborer was suspected, or professed to hold others in suspicion. I sent my family up to Dublin, although we were guarded more securely than we had reason to suppose. Our children told us how they had seen "the sergeant and his men" lying flat among the trees around the house by night. My wife and daughters found that, on their visits to the village, men of soldier-like bearing, but in civilians' clothes, hovered near them. Often I hailed and spoke to the patrol, who appeared to rise up out of the earth. Our servants, however, gave warning, and we feared to engage others. The lodge-keeper alone stood his ground, and kept the house with me.

Gradually the alarm through the district subsided. Arrests were no longer made, and not the slightest injury was done to person or property. I had my family safe in Dublin, and my mind was free. Six days before the rising there had not existed with us the slightest suspicion that an outbreak was intended. The military authorities and police thought otherwise, and they were right. The precautions taken by the State were now the chief proofs that the conspiracy still existed and the very means wisely adopted to obviate or anticipate danger gave birth to apprehension.

A hot pursuit was set on foot after James Fitzpatrick, but in vain. He had timed his flight cleverly, and taken the railway to Dublin at a station nine miles off, although there were two stations nearer. My ponies were brought back next day, and gave proofs of having been ridden desperately hard. Who accompanied Fitzpatrick we never knew. It was supposed he had made for Liverpool, and had hidden himself amongst the dockyard laborers for a time, and then started for New York. The constabulary gathered up and carefully recorded all the evidence they could collect concerning him—to little purpose, as I imagined. But they said, if ever a rising should actually take place, "Fitzpatrick would surely be in the thick of it." He would dare anything, they believed, and could not settle down.

During the interval between the flight of Fitzpatrick and the rising at Tallaght, we heard occasionally vague rumors concerning him. "He had become a great man, entirely;" "He was full of money," and "would soon be back in Ireland with the States army." But we gathered some decided information from the New York papers, which, in their reports of Fenian meetings, recorded his name as that of an accredited agent of "the Irish republic," regularly commissioned to explain the position of the conspiracy in Ireland. He was named in small capitals as "Head Centre" and "District Organiser of the I. R. B." His story harmonised with that told by all the rest who had fled from Ireland, and appeared as "agents" in the cities of the United States. "There were thousands of men, wholboy or partly drilled and disciplined, ready to rise, if they had but arms." Arms, or money to buy arms, would enable "the men in the gap" to liberate Ireland from the British yoke He openly announced his determination to return to "the front," and to join in striking "the final blow" against British tyranny. All this was considered as a device to induce the Celtic element in the United States to subscribe once more to the Fenian treasury. We believed Fitzpatrick to be but a type of a numerous class, Irish in nothing but their birth. Habituated to violence and rapine during the American civil war, the return of peace found them unfitted for industrial employment, and, ready to become the instruments of any American intrigue which promised them congenial occupation, Whiteboyism, Terry altism, Ribbonism, the Pœnix mystery, had been carried to America by a million of emigrants, and there developed into secret societies of vast extent and considerable political influence. The Irish element in these societies was believed to have combined to a man in Fenianism, and to be wielded by clever and unscrupulous leaders for political objects or pecuniary advantage. As a theoretical organisation on paper, the Fenian scheme was remarkably complete; but, as the emissaries of the conspiracy must have known that few persons worthy to be called, by the most liberal application of the term citizens—in position or respectable employment, could be induced to take part in the scheme from first to last, it was not generally believed they would ever oppose to the enormous power of the government the loose waifs and strays who constitute in Ireland the Fenian army.

When this army had melted away at the first touch of the constalbulary on Tallaght Hill, Fitzpatrick was diligently sought for. The authorities were aware that he had acted as one of the leaders in the affray, and there was good reason to suspect that he knew more of the American side of the conspiracy than the rest. He was one whose appearance could not be mistaken. He was not amongst the miserable rabble parade in the Castle-yard the day succeeding the rising; he was not found among the straying fugitives picked up by the police; he certainly had not succeeded in getting through the Wicklow mountains, or making "for the south." We concluded that he had slipped back to Dublin someway, and hidden himself amidst the crowd.

In the wards of an hospital he lay powerless and moribund when I recognised him. A ball had struck him right on the breast-bone, and, glancing off, ran in a semicircle to the shoulder, and there, breaking the clavicle, passed out. A thick blue welt, tight as a rope, marked the track of the ball. The blood oozed drop by drop from the narrow puncture, and would not be stanched. The stars in their courses had fought against the Feniaus. Never was there known in Ireland so bitter a month as the March which the conspirators madly chose for their attempt. For two endless nights and two inclement days Fitzpatrick had lain in a furrow freezing to death. Then the gathering of a flock of crows around his hiding place led to his discovery. He was carefully lifted up and borne away, no longer an enemy. He could not have been more kindly tended. He could only look his thanks. This only I gathered from his whispered words, spoken at long intervals: that he had been treacherously shot by one of his American confederates because he knew too much.

All that he knew lies buried with him. We buried him among "his own people," in a sunny graveyard. He was the last of his kin in Ireland. I see his grave every Sunday, and the children have made it bloom with daffodils and primroses. There is often a little group gathered around the place. They know as yet nothing of treachery or treason, but much of old companionship and pleasant hours on sunny days upon the moorland.

A MYSTERY STILL.

NEARLY half a century ago, a young fellow with a smartish air, though of a small ill-proportioned figure, landed at the Cape of Good Hope, bringing letters of introduction to the governor of that colony from a well known eccentric Scottish nobleman. This fair-faced slender youth held the humble rank of an assistant-surgeon in the army.

He soon showed that he possessed the power of self-appreciation to such a degree as required a little taking down. But this was found to be no easy task. He had the faculty called, in French, l'audace, often a good substitute for ability; but when the two go hand in hand, they carry all before them, in one shape or other; and as the young surgeon was as clever as he was impudent, he made a position for himself, and, what is more, he kept it.

Doctor James—we give part of his name as it stood in the Army List in 1865—was a physician by Edinburg diploma. As we shall show by and by, he never held any regimental rank, passing, contrary to all precedent, to his full surgeoncy on the staff.

By dates from unquestionable records; he seems to have received his diploma at the early age of fifteen. Whether these dates corresponed with his certificate of baptism it is impossible to say, as, under all circumstances, it may be doubtful whether such a document ever existed.

Whatever might have been the status of military medical men fifty years since, James liked his calling, and, socially speaking, was a gentleman every inch of him: though this is not literally saying very much for him, seeing he was but a little man. He had a fair allowance from some source or other; but he never spoke of any relatives or friends out of the military profession. He kept a horse and a private servant, and, as a strict vegetarian, would touch none but the most delicate fruits of the earth. Potatoes and apples were to him, "filthy roots;" the odor of cabbage turned him sick; but he liked peas, and craved for asparagus, sea-kale, peaches, grapes, melons, figs, custard-apples, and, above all, mangoes. Coffee was the only stimulant he could bear, except when ill and then he would sip diluted champagne or brandy, medicinally.

Some called him a toady; but, his letters of introduction placed him at once in the best society of the colony. Neither had he health for general visiting. With those among whom he lived, he made friends, and kept them. His testiness was harmless, his abilities were unquestionable; and it having been intimated to the governor that the young medico's duties were to be made as light as the rules of the service would permit, he was installed as honorary physician to his excellency's family, and soon obtained such a reputation, both as physician and surgeon, that private practice came to him without his seeking it. His queer ways and irritable temper rather increased than diminished his prestige, and he held his own through good report and evil report.

When first called in to a patient, he would have the room cleared of everything previously prescribed, and would almost invariably order, as a preface to his course of treatment, a bath of Cape wine! Happen what might, he claimed the whole credit of a cure, or blamed others for failure. He was, to be sure, sent for at times as a last resource. If the patient recovered, Doctnr James had all the merit; if death ensued, "Doctor James had unfortunately been summoned when the case was hopeless."

His excellency had spoiled him. He became a kind of tame imp, encouraged as amusing and harmless enough; but, like such imps, he took advantage one day of his position, and was impertinent. He had the entrée of the governor's private cabinet. One morning, sauntering in, he had the assurance to make some querulous remarks on an official document lying on the table. Finally, he worked himself into such an offensive pet, that his Excellency resolved to give him a lesson; so, snatching the little fellow up by the collar of his uniform, he swung him over the window-sill—a few feet above the grassy garden—and shook him. James screeched and cried peccavi. He was forgiven, and never offended there in the same way again. Still, everyone was persuaded that such unwarrantable humors as he exhibited, were only tolerated by reason of certain influences that remain a mystery to this day. His next adventure might have ended his career. The story from the Government House got bruited abroad, and much fun was raised at Doctor James' expense. Some laughed about it, in such a way as that James could not but be aware of the fact. He had been looking out for a chance of checking the sauciness of some of the young fellows in the garrison, and here was the chance at last. One morning, a tall cornet, whose contemptuous manner had much irritated him, was sauntering along under the trees of a charming walk, in one of the most public parts of Cape Town—where, to this day, the people are wont to sit upon the stoops, men smoking, women knitting, and grave little Dutch children toddling up and down—when James strutted up to the young dragoon; a member of the governor's staff. James stopped the way with a defiant air. Some ill-conditioned person had made the most of the cornet's disparaging jests. James was glad of this opportunity of asserting himself. High words ensued, the doctor's shrill voice piercing the air, and thus drawing attention (as he intended it should) to the encounter, which ended in a challenge. Next morning a quiet little duel took place. It ended well. Hands were shaken, and cornet and doctor became good friends for life. If the affair ever came to the ears of the Governor, he thought it best to ignore it, according to the fashion of the day.

Doctor James afforded a good illustration of the triumph of mind over matter. Tetchy as he was, he never excited any professional jealousy albeit, in defiance of all precedent, he was promoted on the staff as full surgeon without doing a day's regimental duty. Frail in body, unique in appearance, and eccentric in manner, he insured respect by his capacity; and, as he could be courteous when he pleased, his oddities were excused by his colleagues. He must have realized at this period considerable sums by his private practice, but he never changed his mode of living. He kept a black servant, a serviceable pony, and a small dog called Psyche. Most of Pysche's successors bore her name. This queer quartette usually took their walks abroad in company, and were a well-known group at Cape Town.

On Dr. James' return to England, he was offered an appointment at another colonial station. Here, owing to the climate, or possibly to non-appreciation, he grew discontented, and, without making any official application for leave of absence, on plea of sickness or "urgent private affairs," took his departure for England.

He would chuckle as he related the story of his unlooked-for appearance before the director-general of the medical department in London. "Sir," said the doctor, "I do not understand your reporting yourself in this fashion. You admit you have returned without a leave of absence. May I ask how this is?"

"Well," said James, coolly running his long white fingers through his crisp sandy curls, "I have come home to have my hair cut."

He had more than once defied the rules of the service with impunity and invariably boasted that he could have his choice of quarters. And he had. He was counted a lucky fellow; but who he was, or what he was, never ceased to be a question of debate among his brethren less fortunate than he.

It would scarcely be supposed that he would submit to the banishment of St. Helena, but he thought "it might suit him very well," and he accepted it. It did suit him very well, until he made it too hot to hold him. The climate pleased him. The fruits and delicate vegetables were strong considerations with him. His health was more settled than in former days, his reputation was high, and he had brought with him his usual letters of introduction. Despite his shuffling gate, he might have been no more than thirty, although he had been an M. D. nearly twenty-four years! His smooth face, his sandy hair, and a tolerable set of teeth, contributed essentially to his juvenile appearance.

He was now principal medical officer. He installed himself in a pretty cottage at the head of James Town, and revelled in the tropical fruits, as many who read this account will remember. A certain mango-tree was his favorite bower. He paid well for all he had, and those who had the best opportunities of knowing him asserted that, selfish, odd, and cranky as he was, he had kindness for the poor, and was charitable without ostentation. He would go about, bestridiug his pony in strange fashion, with an umbrella over his head. His saddle was a curiosity. It was so comfortably padded and so safely shaped, that, once wedged into it, it was a marvel how he got out of it. In uniform he was a caricature. His boot heel were two inches above the ground, and within the boots were soles three inches thick. Add to these boots very long spurs, crown the sandy curls with a cocked hat, and complete all with a sword big enough for a dragoon, and you have the doctor complete. The pony was enveloped in a net from ears to heels, and swung the tassels about impatient of the gear. The black man attended at the beast's head, and Psyche tripped after them, the doctor's treble waking up the hot silence of the one narrow street shut in by barren rocks, and Psyche's bark making discord at intervals.

He estaolished himself in the old fashion at Government House, where he was suffered to talk of his aristocratic acquaintance, sometimes alluding to those of other days in a manner sufficiently puzzling. As at Cape Town, he became the family physician, or considered himself such, and gave himself his usual airs when called in to a private family. He effected some great cures, and gained the confidence of his patients. His presence at the hospital was a signal for the juniors to be all on the alert. The soldiers liked him and trusted in his skill; but woe betide the laggard medico who was not there to receive the P. M. O., or who had swerved one hair's-breath from his instructions.

All went on harmoniously enough for upwards of a year when the doctor, in an evil moment, picked a quarrel with an officer of the garrison. The affair led to a challenge, which the doctor declined in no dignified way, and it was followed by his open expulsion from the garrison mess as an honorary member. Finally, the governer called for a court of inquiry, which resulted in James being sent home under arrest.

The writer of this article witnessed his exit from James Town. On one of those still sultry mornings peculiar to the tropics, the measured step of the doctor's pony woke up the echoes of the valley. There came the P. M. O., looking faded and crestfallen. He was in plain clothes. He had shrunk away wonderfully. His blue jacket hung loosely about him, his white trousers were a world too wide, the veil garnishing his broad straw hat covered his face, and he carried the inevitable umbrella over his head so that it screened him from the general gaze. The street was deserted, but other eyes besides the writer's looked on the group through the Venetian blinds. No sentry presented arms at the gates, and the familiar quartette proceeded unnoticed along the lines to the ship's boat in waiting.

His influence had been at work for him before he landed.

He was released from arrest, outrageous as his conduct had been, and again had his choice of quarters. He went to other stations, in the tropics, to Greece, and the Mediterranean

He retained his taste for Government House society, and as he grew older got less testy. He began to think of death and sepulture, and would have had a friend in the West Indies take an oath that, if he (James) died there he should be buried in the garments he wore at the time. The friend declined to swear, but James did not quarrel with him.

His last voyage was made as an amateur. One winter drove him to the West Indies again, where he gave out "confidentially" that his reasons for leaving England were very sad: "a broken-off engagement with a young and beautiful creature, and some trouble in money matters. He had lost documents, jewels, and family records, on board a vessel which had foundered at sea. He was unhappy, and he wanted solace." His former opponent in the duel was commander-in-chief, and he and James were capital friends.

The summer of '64 brought him back to England, with Black John and a little dog, whose name was not Psyche. As the creature is probably living, she shall be nameless. Doctor James must now have been quite seventy years old. His friends of former days held by him to the last; he was often, ailing; and the kind ladies of his Cape patron's family would take him out driving in the park, and would have him to dinner, with provision of suitable fruits and cakes and coffee.

It was asserted that he aspired to the honor of being a K. C. B., and his new uniform was ordered for the last levee of the season. No doubt, his service entitled him of some distinction; and his influence still existed somewhere. One day he returned to his lodgings from a carriage ride, shivering and feverish. He went to bed, and dispatched Black John with his excuses from a dinner engagement for next day, Sunday.

On that Sunday morning, Black John went into his master's room, as usual, to lay out his body linen. Six towels were among the invariable items of his toilet, and though Black John never assisted at it personally, he was aware that his

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JULY 6, 1867.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—A POLITICAL PERIL.

THERE is a species of lazy amiability which, in its extreme readiness to "forget and forgive," in its freedom from suspicion and distrust, and its ready faith in promises of amendment on the part of those who have committed offences, is to be regarded as a weakness rather than a virtue, and savors more of folly than benevolence. Victor Hugo's sketch of the good bishop who is so ready to trust Jean Valjean with his candle-sticks, notwithstanding his knowledge that the latter is a discharged convict, is very delightful, but we fear that in real life, the men who exhibit most of this charming confidence in sudden reformations of old offenders, will generally be found to unite much flabbiness of brain with their undoubted goodness of heart.

Dickens represents even those supernaturally benevolent and guileless old gentlemen, the Cheeryble Brothers, as thinking it proper, notwithstanding their faith in human nature and their favorable impressions of their protegee, to institute some inquiries in regard to his antecedents, and the truth of his statements about himself; and they could scarcely have been pictured as more careless and confiding, without danger of exciting in the mind of the judicious reader some little contempt for their understandings, to alloy his admiration of their childlike simplicity.

The ideas and feelings of a large portion of the people of North, at the close of the war, on the subject of reconstruction and the policy to be pursued toward the baffled conspirators against the Government, were of the most sentimental and visionary character. Thousands of excellent men in regard to whose staunch loyalty there could be no shadow of doubt, were carried so far by the generous impulses that revolt against the appearance of cruelty toward a conquered and helpless antagonist, as to advocate a policy that endangered all the results of the struggle, and rendered all the noble lives that the war had cost, a fruitless sacrifice. The magnanimity of some of these men may be compared to that of the chivalrous individual, attacked on the highway, who, after getting his assailant down, should release without disarming him, upon no other guarantee of his own security than the highwayman's word of honor.

At the time when the struggle between Congress and the Executive, on the subject of reconstruction, first broke out, we are inclined to believe that a majority of loyal men in the North were so under the influence of this spirit of amiable but unwise magnanimity, that they were, for a while, inclined to take sides with the President, and to welcome "our Southern brethren" back into the Union and restore them to the full exercise of political power, with no other guaranty for the safety of the negro, and the permanence of the results of the contest than might be found in renewed oaths by men who had broken old ones, and in new provisions reluctantly inserted in Southern State Constitutions. At that time half the Union papers in this State, either came out distinctly for President Johnston's policy, or remained in doubt and hesitation between the desire on the one hand to make certain of the fruits of the hard contest, and reluctance on the other, to exercise unnecessary harshness toward the vanquished. It was not until the spirit that animated the vanquished rebels—the spirit that revealed itself in the massacre at New Orleans, and in hundreds of cruelties and outrages on a smaller scale—began to be understood, that President Johnson was universally abandoned by the party that had elected him.

At present there can scarcely be said to be two parties, in the political sense, in the land, for the distinction is not properly so much between Republicans and Democrats, as between loyal men and disloyal men. No one, who reads the Democratic papers, can mistake their spirit. It is the very spirit of the rebellion, baffled, but not subdued, sullen, but not repentant, no less malignant than when it exulted over Bull Run, and denied or explained away Union victories, but no less malignant—only more prudent.

It is not, therefore, between two political parties, so far as is now apparent, but between Union men and disunionists, that the next Presidential contest is to be fought. Questions about tariffs, national banks, currency, taxes, etc., may be brought into the canvass, to secure votes in this or the other section, but they will not constitute the real issue. Underlying all these, will be the great questions upon the decision of which it depends whether we shall secure the full legitimate results of the war, sufficient guarantees for the rights of Unionists and negroes in the South, the overthrow of all distinctions of caste and race, so far as equality before the law is concerned. What we have to fear is, that though the prevalence of a sentimental spirit of conciliation, through forgetfulness of the lessons of the past ten years, and through that partiality for compromises and accommodations which is always evinced by leading party managers of Presidential elections, the Republican party may, in the attempt to prepare a popular platform and programme, make weak concessions of principle, and fail to come boldly up to the standard required of them by fidelity to ideas. No one familiar with politics, as a practical thing, need be told that President making is a very important matter with even the purest of active politicians, and that good and patriotic men, such as those who now lead the Republican party, have not always resisted the temptation to conceal a little of the truth they hold, or to express it in equivocal words, when such a course seemed necessary to secure a successful canvass. From this time until after the election, our statesmen will be politicians, and even those most faithful to ideas and theories, will become unusually practical. With all men who belong to a party, party success is of course an important end, and with many of the leaders of the Republican party, we have no doubt that it is important, not from selfish considerations, but from high and patriotic ones; but we trust that the men who are now engaged in preparing programmes and selecting candidates, will not go too far in the direction of concession to what are called "conservative" views, and above all, that they will give us as a Presidential candidate, a man of positive convictions, of decided purposes, and of sufficient intellectual calibre to be quite free from the danger of becoming a puppet in the hands of crafty advisers, or of attempting to bring about a political millenium by a policy of milk and water conciliation.

IRISH SKETCHES.

OUR contemporary, the Monitor, takes what strikes us as a rather curious view of the responsibility assumed by a literary journal, in copying tales and sketches from foreign periodicals. Our aim is to make our literary selections as various and as interesting as possible. When last week we published the sketch entitled "Vinegar Hill," from Dickens' All The Year Round, we selected it simply on account of its literary merit. We have, on the same principle, occasionally published screeds of rebel poetry, and whenever we shall meet with an Irish story or sketch as brilliant and as interesting as those above mentioned, and written from a point of view more agreeble to the ideas and convictions of the Monitor, we shall be delighted to publish it. Meantime, it is to be remembered that there are generally, at least two widely different versions of all exciting historical events. It would be grand, for instance, to find two writers who would tell the story of the Vigilance Committee of '56 in precisely the same way, or to find any writer who could furnish a narrative of the events of that year in this city, that would not be pronounced false and slanderous by many readers.

Sale of the Beideman Estate.—Mr. J. W. Brumagim, administrator with will annexed, will sell at public auction on Wednesday, July 24th, at the Salesroom of Maurice Dore & Co., the total property belonging to said estate, comprising the most desirable property for residences in this city. The greater portion of the Beideman Tract lies directly in the path way of the city's growth, and some of the finest residences in San Francisco have been erected upon lots adjoining those of the Beideman Estate within the last six months. There has never been such valuable and desirable property offered at any public sale in this city before; nor any property offered on such liberal terms of sale—three-quarters of the purchase money to remain on long credit at 8 per cent. interest per annum.

The Pioneers' Election.—The annual election of officers of the Society of California Pioneers will take place on Monday next, at the rooms of the Association. William R. Wheaton, Esq., who held the office of Secretary of the society for the four years preceding his election as County Assessor, is the candidate on the "Members' Ticket" for the office of President, a position for which he is eminently qualified, and to the honor connected with which, no member can make more just and well-founded pretensions.

New Music.—We have received from M. Gray, music publisher, 609 & 613 Clay street, a piece of music arranged for voice and piano, by Mme. la Baronne Willy de Rothschild, with an accompaniment for guitar, by Senor M. Y. Ferrer, entitled "Tell me why you come to me." The words are by Victor Hugo, the translation is by G. C. H. The song is the prettily expressed complaint of a lover, whose mistress continually throws herself in his way. The music is well adapted to the sentiment of the words.

"CARNALITY" IN FICTION.

THE critical knight of the Round Table, who some months since ran so fierce a tilt against the author of Griffith Gaunt, eliciting thereby a shrill note of wrath and defiance—not, perhaps, altogether unmingled with pain—from that truculent champion of what may, perhaps, be called the anti-fig leaf school of art, is, we think called upon in consistency again to unsheath his sword and to couch his lance against new, and this time, cis-Atlantic foes. Whatever there may have been in Mr. Reade's novel against which the objections raised by the Round Table can be fairly urged, may be found in a far more palpable, distinct, and offensive form, in Dr. Holmes' Guardian Angel, and in Mr. De Forrest's very brilliant novel, recently published, entitled Miss Ravenel's Conversion from Secession to Loyalty, a work of fiction, superior in certain respects to any yet achieved by an American writer.

No one who has followed the course of Dr. Holmes' story thus far, can have failed to be struck by the boldness and originality of those portions of it which treat of the relations so minutely and subtly described as existing first, between Myrtle Hazard, and the physician, Fordyce Hurlbut, and subsequently, between her and the Rev. Bellamy Stoker, and of the influence which each of these mature men in turn, is represented to have exerted over the young girl, no careful reader, we say, can have failed to notice the peculiar, and so far as we can now remember, the unprecedented manner in which Dr. Holmes has handled this part of his story; but whether this innovation upon the old-fashioned mode of dealing with certain facts in regard to the reciprocal influence of the sexes upon each other, under certain abnormal and morbid conditions, awakens admiration or dislike in the reader, will depend upon the taste of the individual, or upon the theory of art which he may have accepted.

In Mr. De Forrest's novel, the same, to us, very disagreable style of minute description and analysis, is applied to the same subject. Lillie Ravenel, the heroine, is very cleverly sketched, and her lover, Col. Carter is, we believe, drawn to the exact life. The same may be said of the artful widow, Mrs. La Rue, to whose blandishments the recently married Colonel falls so easy a victim. We have no doubt that these characters are drawn with perfect fidelity. We are not prepared to deny that pure young girls, spirited, true-minded, and carefully nurtured, may be subject to the kind of spell, which the middle-aged, demoralized, and corrupt man of the world, is represented as having thrown over the heroine of Mr. De Forrest's novel, even in the presence of so noble a rival as Coleburn, and while she was under the watchful care of a wise father, to whom she was devotedly attached, and who from the beginning warned her against her unworthy fascinater. Neither are we presumptuous enough to question the correctness of Dr Holmes' description of the "symptoms" of Myrtle Hazard, under the psychological influence of her physician, or her minister. To attempt such a discussion would imply an acquaintance with psychological, physiological, and mesmeric mysteries, which we can not pretend to. In those matters, Dr. Holmes is an authority entitled to be respected, and if to be confuted, it must be by his brother savants. Mr. De Forrest, too, discourses of women and their weaknesses, in a peculiarly knowing way, and with all the easy consciousness of "seeing into them" and tracing their most secret springs of action, that characterizes Charles Reade. But, granting the fidelity and accuracy of these delineations, granting that they are as true to the life as the plates in a treatise on anatomy, we object to them that they do not furnish a kind of material that is suitable to the purposes of the poet or the writer of fiction, that they have no legitimate place in imaginative literature, and should never, for any purpose, or under any pretence to be introduced into compositions claiming to be works of art. We do not attack the materialism of this sort of writing, and the apparent denial of free agency and of the self determining power of the will in one human being when brought into contact, under certain conditions, with another human being differently organized, as being philosophically false; but we object to the "situations" introduced for the purpose of illustrating these ideas upon purely æsthetic grounds. We do not say that the situations are impossible, or that the ideas are untrue; we only declare that the former are repulsive, and that if the ideas are sound, they should be presented in scientific and didactic shape, and not in a popular novel. Dr. Holmes and Mr. De Forrest, are not guilty of any such grossness, either of thought or expression in developing their phychological notions, as the elder Dumas exhibits in "Joseph Balsamo;" indeed they cannot fairly be charged with any actual indelicacy of expression whatever. Notwithstanding which, both the stories mentioned, are pervaded by "an atmosphere of carnality"—we can find no better phrase to express our meaning—more unmistakable than is to be found in "Griffith Gaunt."

Music is the most delightful, rational entertainment that the human mind can possibly enjoy.

It is more important to discover a new source of happiness on earth than a new planet in the sky.

A PEDAGOGICAL ROASTING.

BY DOGBERRY.

I AM now about to gratify a long contemplated plan of revenge for a cruel outrage perpetrated upon me about seven years ago by a male and female teacher. They roasted me alive in their school-house.

At that time I had just assumed the pedagogical charge of a flock of fifty or sixty juveniles in a small mining town of one of the Southern counties. Having had some previous experience in herding cattle, I was in a measure prepared for the task. California children at that period, and in that locality, were very wild. I was also wild. For years previous I had been leading a nomadic, mining life; a life that put far away and made strange to me such things as pertain to a civilized domestic existence.

It was hot work controlling the flock placed in my hands School-teaching, with the thermometer at 100 and upward, will bring all the irritability in a person's nature to the surface. But that is nothing compared with being roasted alive in a school-house by pedantic fiends.

So much difficulty did I experience in the management of my school, that I determined to visit an educational institution in a larger town a few miles distant in order to gather, if possible, a few ideas on school discipline. I walked to the place. I walked into the seminary of brick and brains, perched on a high, hot hill with a small graveyard on one side and an unoccupied dwelling house on the other, whose shivered windows bore striking testimony to the accuracy with which the juveniles had taught themselves to throw stones. I walked in just as the pedantical foundry had commenced operations for the afternoon. I explained my errand to the male roaster. He welcomed me heartily to his educational oven, and instead of allowing me to occupy a quiet corner as I wished, bore me up to the teachers' platform and seated me in an arm chair in full view of the whole school.

At that time I was a victim of constitutional embarrassment. I was just out of the woods. Ranged along at the front desks were some fifteen or twenty young ladies who, by this time are wives and mothers—or should be. I do not wish to say that they stared at me. But they certainly looked that way very hard. And their glances at each other were expressive of the idea "What's that?" Perhaps my appearance justified the inquiry.

Behind the young ladies, sat the boys, large and small. Among them were facetious urchins, who, when the teacher's back was turned, grinned at me and threw spit-balls at each other.

Mr. A., the gentleman in charge of the roasting department, then proceeded to inflict further torture by informing the pupils in a very loud voice that I was "a teacher, a famous teacher, from a neighboring town," who had visited them in order to see what proficiency they had made in their studies.

When I heard Mr. A. make the remark about a "famous teacher," I knew he had designs on me. I saw spread out before me, for that afternoon, an eternity of misery.

I was not a famous teacher. I came simply as an humble disciple, desiring to sit at his feet and learn pedagogical wisdom. I wanted to sit, unobserved, in a corner. But I was not allowed to learn in my own way, in a corner. I was rushed up on that platform and represented as a brilliant pedantical light, when I scarcely knew the alphabet of the art of teaching.

Why was this? Why was I so overpraised? I know, now, Mr. A. was a thorough schoolmaster. It was the business of his life. The world does not appreciate schoolmasters. They suffer from this lack of appreciation. I was a scapegoat from the wicked world that had strayed into that pedagogical pound. I had the presumption to try and be a schoolmaster. He had got me just where he wanted, and it was his intention to make one man aware that neither school teachers or their profession are to be regarded lightly.

Mr. and Mrs. A., who had charge of this institution, were also on the county board of examination, for the purpose of determining whether unfortunates, unable any longer to beg, borrow or steal for a living, were fit to teach school. At such times they took a fiendish delight in setting arithmetical, geographical and grammatical traps for the unwary man or woman who had fallen into their hands. They tortured applicants with such questions as "Is is a verb?" "Is it proper to say spoonfulls, or spoonsfull?" "What is a letter?" Then the poor wretch would writhe in endeavoring to give immediate expression to his ideas, and they would sit by and enjoy his misery.

The roaster called up a class in grammar, somewhat advanced. He handed me a book and requested that I should conduct the recitation. I endeavored to excuse myself. He insisted. I was obliged to refuse, point-blank. The truth was, I was somewhat rusty in grammar, and although conversant with its general principles, I could not triumphantly conduct a recitation. In this skillful manner did he, to his pupils make me appear, a dunce. I, "the famous teacher from a neighboring town!" And I, the while, sat in his arm-chair, and tried to appear dignified, while the facetious urchins grinned at each other, and the young ladies indulged in a faint titter, which the roaster pretended not to hear. The wretch suspended the discipline of his school to enhance my misery. After he had marched the class through their grammatical evolutions he requested me to make them a few remarks relative to the study in question. I did make a remark, internally. It was of a profane character. Again I tried excuses. They were of no avail. I must say something. I arose. I felt as if I was raising the whole building with me. I said, "Ladies and Gentlemen—no, dear children. Grammar is an interesting study," and then they all laughed, and the roaster turned his back and walked away, pretending to look out of a window, and when I came to reflect, as I did, for about ten seconds, over the ridiculousness of the assertion I had made about grammar, I laughed, myself, and sat down.

The grammar class went to their seats seemingly in a very joyous frame of mind, leaving me very red and uncomfortable. I thought of many things. I thought of what Tom Riper and a lot of my old mining partners would say and do if they saw me in my present situation.

Then he called up a class in geography. There I thought myself at home. But that dreadful teacher had instructed that class in a miserable theory relative to the precession of the equinoxes, and cunningly managed to draw the recitation in that direction. You see, he was a professional schoolteacher, and they have all these things at their tongue's end. I had not the shadow of an idea regarding the precession of the equinoxes, and it was not long before these small boys and girls knew it. I prespired very freely. The roaster rejoiced internally. I could feel him. Figuratively, he again elevated me before that class as a dunce, who would presume to teach school. Of course he wanted me to make a few remarks to this class. By this time he had completely pschycologized me into complete control of his will. Again I arose like an automaton. "My friends." said I. Recollect I had never before spoken to any kind of an audience. "My friends, you have great privileges. When I was a boy." Then I forgot myself and thought, "O would I were a boy again"—or a rock, or a tree, or a stump, or an ox, or an idiot, anything to be out of this dreadful place. I sat down. The roaster dismissed his class without further remark. I intimated that I thought I had better go. But he wouldn't hear of any departure. He wished me to witness his improved method of teaching infants the alphabet, and, calling up a row of imps, he caused them to call aloud together letter after letter. Each infantile shout raised me a couple of inches from my chair.

Finally the roaster wished me to visit the recitation room where the roasteress was conducting the recitation of the most advanced pupils in mathematics. There they had been getting ready a hot fire for me the whole afternoon. I went in. I had now no particle of my own identity left. This class had progressed into compound proportion or what in other days was termed "the double rule of three."

Here I faced the same array of young ladies, who smiled, not so very sweetly, on me when I made my speech on grammar. As I sat down the roasteress observed that it was a very hot afternoon, and that the whole school were undergoing a roasting process. She pretended to be adverting to the weather. But I knew what she meant. She put a cursed arithmetic in my unwilling hands. It was open at those unearthly and useless complications of numbers in compound proportion. I had not performed those examples for years. How could I now trace correctly the working of such a mathematical exercise? Nevertheless I faced the music. I looked mathematical wisdom. I propounded two examples. Two fearful, youthful mathematical geniuses stepped to the board. They covered it with figures. I knew not whether they added, subtracted, multiplied or divided. Neither did I care. I threw all my energies into the expression of my face. They finished and turned to me. I pronounced it correct. I knew not if they were or no. I complimented them on their proficiency and mathematical skill. The roasteress eyed me doubtfully. So did the pupils. I suppose they imagined that I cropped out with a sort of suspicious brightness in the science of numbers. I didn't care what they imagined. I felt that the roasting was over. I was done; well done, and by the perspiratory streams pouring over me, I felt basted as well as roasted. They allowed me to depart—me, the "famous teacher from an adjoining town." The school was dismissed. I went through the mockery of thanking these fiends for the kindness they had shown me. When I crawled away down the hill, I could feel those smart pupils standing in groups at the top gazing with a sort of a pitying contempt on the "famous school teacher from a neighboring town," a wiser, but a very wet and wilted man.

WOODWARD'S GARDENS.—During the present hot weather Woodward's Gardens are a most delightful resort. Many, after strolling round examining the numerous curiosities to be seen, lie under the shady trees, and spend the afternoon pleasantly with a cigar and a book.

THE PARIS EXPOSITION.

THE Exposition is neither a swindle nor a failure, and seems likely to be pecuniarily remunerative. The attendance is immense, and those who visited the show when it was yet in disorder are astonished anew by its symmetry, its variety and grandeur. A New Jersey locomotive carried off the prize affixed to its class, and in machinery, as usual, America appears to good advantage. Remarkably, again, our art collection is viewed with almost unexceptional admiration, though it would hardly be considered by us first-rate or representative, and undoubtedly contains some wretched paintings. Mr Church's "Niagara" took a second prize, and we shall be disappointed if honor is not done also to Mr. Homer's masterpiece, "Prisoners, from the Front." The American department, like the English, is closed on Sunday, partly, we supose, to relieve the attendants, but chiefly out of respect for the estimation in which the day is held in both countries. Naturally this causes serious disappointment to Continental visitors, and especially to the laboring classes of Paris, for whom Sunday is the only holiday.

The Exhibition is growing from day to day, and is becoming both so vast and so magnificent that all doubt of its being a brilliant success has gone to join the years before the flood. Nothing comparable to that wondrous collection of marvels has ever been seen in this world; it is difficult to believe that just such a gathering will ever be got together again. Means for transporting to and from the Exhibition 11,000 people per hour have already been brought into play; but these being altogether insufficient, a M. Logerot has just solicited and obtained an audience of the Emperor, to set forth to his Majesty a project of his for conveying 40,000 people per hour from the centre of the town to the gates of the great show.

The eating department is going on brilliantly; the especial "rage" of the moment being the dinners at the Russian restaurant. But that all are flourishing may be inferred from the fact that a single restaurant, and not the most in favor, furnished yesterday 1,500 lunches and 5,000 dinners!—New York Nation.

KELLER'S WINES.—An extract from the monthly report of the Agriculture department, for March. 1867, which appeared in the Alta California of Wednesday last, announced that Keller has received the approval of the Committee for his white wine, Angelica, and Wine Bitters. This endorses the public's opinion as to the superiority of these wines over all others of a similar class. Keller's wine vault is in the basementt of the Merchant's Exchange, corner Battery and Washington streets. The office is in the same building, Washington street, a few doors below Battery.

WASHINGTON RESTAURANT.—This establishment has been re-opened by "Nick," at No. 394 California street, above Battery, where he would be pleased to see his old friends and the public.

After seven years absence from San Francisco, he has returned to cater to the taste of the public, at his new place, as above. His old patrons will find the same unrivalled "waffles," coffee, and lunches. This will be a convenient place for the merchants and brokers of California street, to get a hurried bite of all the delicacies of the season. About noon you will catch him in the "Nick" of time.

master wrapped these cloths about him; whether he did so for warmth, or to conceal any personal defects in his emaciated form, was a mystery. No wonder the form was emaciated, for James had accustomed himself for many years to periodical blood-lettings, either by leeches or lancet.

On Black John's return to the room, he found his master worse, but nothing would elicit his permission to send for the medical friend who had been in attendance on him previously, for bronchitis. The faithful valet was alarmed, but he and the dog were the only watches on the sufferer throughout the sultry July day. James lay dozing and powerless. It was after midnight when he rallied.

He sat up and spoke to John, wandering at times, and expressed concern at his long attendance through so many hours; he would have had John take some slight stimulant, which the faithful soul declined. Suddenly James fainted on his pillow. The valet used restoratives, which revived him.

"John," gasped the invalid, "this must be death." But John did not think so.

"You are only weak, sir," he said; "let me give you some champagne and water, or the least drop of brandy in a wine-glass of water." For James would take such stimulants in great extremity, and he was now in great extremity. He sipped a little from the glass, and said, more gently than usual: "Have some yourself, John; you need it, you will not mind drinking after me." They were his last distinct words. John again declined refreshment, fearing he might fall asleep, but, at his master's request, went to lie down in an adjoining room; thinking that "the general," as James chose to be designated by his valet, would get some rest.

Always considerate to his dependents, "the general" had been almost tender to John. He had spoken to him of his lonely life. "It was not always so, John," he said; "once I had many friends. I have some still, and those are very good to me; but they are not the friends of early times; they will think of me, though, and if you want help, they will remember you for my sake. Now go and lie down. I think I shall sleep."

He never woke again. At daylight John entered the sick-room. The curtains were closed, so he took the night-light and approached the bed. "The general" had died without a struggle. His eyes were closed. The worn features were calm. There had been apparently no pain.

John drew the sheet over his face, and descended to the kitchen for a charwoman, who he knew would be there at that hour. He summoned her to assist him at the last toilet of the dead "general." As she closed the door of the room, he retreated to his own, and laid himself down, tired out. He was closing his eyes, when the charwoman hurried in. "What do you mean," she said, "by calling me to lay out a general, and the corpse is a woman's."

John was utterly unprepared for this, although, like many others, he had fancied the "general" to be "different from other people in some way or other." There had been floating suspicions about the sex of the doctor, but John declared he had never thoroughly shared in them. He had lived with the "general" three years, and, whatever doubt he may have had at first, he had latterly dismissed from his mind.

According to John's account, the poor creature—the "old girl," as the ghastly adept in her calling terms her—was not treated in her last toilet with the courtesy she had never wanted during her military career. Before the poor corpse was laid in its grave, news reached the registry general of the discovery, and he at once called for a report from the proper authority. The report was, "that, after a post-mortem examination, it was found that Doctor James, of her Majesty's service, was not only a woman, but had at a very early period of life been a mother."

The deceased's effects were taken possession of by accredited agents. Notwithstanding the large sums of money she must have received as fees during her private practice, she died penniless. The question arises—how had she spent the fortune she had made? As hush-money, or in support of the child who, if still living, must be an elderly person?

James left no will. There was nothing to leave but the poor dog. A Nobleman's valet came for the poor animal; settled accounts with Black John, even to giving him the return passage-money to the island whence he came; and no one has since appeared claiming any relationship with the eccentric being, who was even more mysterious in death than in life.

Doctor James was buried at Kensal Green late in July, 1865, and is registered under the name borne from the time of his entering the army as hospital assistant.

On the last occasion when Charles Kean played Louis XI. in Edinburgh, at the Theatre Royal, after the attendants had proclaimed, "The King is dead," a devout Irishman exclaimed, "And may the Lord have mercy on his guilty soul!" as for the moment he thought that the scene was real.

THE ENTERPRISING IMPRESARIO.

AND what is Impresario? If we turn to an Italian dictionary we shall find it explained thus:—

Impresario, s. m., one who undertakes a public job—the manager of a theatre.

According to this definition our hero may be a Member of Parliament—a much-abused promoter—an undertaker pure and simple—or, in short, any individual who interests himself or is concerned in the management of (as Graglia elegantly says) "a public job." It will, however, suit the present purpose to adopt the latter part of the translation as it stands, and acknowledge at once that our enterprising Impresario is neither more nor less than a theatrical manager, who is indebted to some good-natured critic for the flattering appellation which stands at the head of these columns.

It is hard to say what particular curriculum of study is necessary to qualify the professional Impresario for his vocation; whether he ever or never was under the fostering wing of Alma Mater. The lawyer in his course of hard work, acquires what is known as the "legal mind." The physician in his professional pursuits forms certain habits and mannerisms by which he is easily recognized. The city merchant, whether in counting-house or country-house is not to be mistaken; but an Impresario, unless he be a vocalist or an actor who has gone into the "undertaking line," defies the most acute observer of men and manners to say off-hand what he is, and how he makes his money—the latter, by the way, a question sometimes difficult even for himself to answer.

A thorough knowledge of his business should include experience in painting, to enable him to judge correctly the scenic effects of the stage and expenses of the painting room; taste in music and the drama; correct appreciation of the abilities of those to be engaged, whether singers, actors, dancers, or instrumentalists; and if he would properly economize, he should have an acute idea of the value of silks, satins, and other articles employed in the theatrical wardrobe. Taking him for all in all, the Impresario is an anomaly; never at rest, and yet an idle man; selfish, but continually promoting the success of others; worshipped when sought after, to be, when found, remorselessly tormented; he leads the most anxious life, and can nevertheless indulge in venison and champagne, while others make his fortune; he is at once the most despotic ruler and submissive slave: the "super" trembles at his nod, while he is kneeling at the prima donna's feet. He is the incarnation of unlimited liability. He is liable to the public, liable to the artists, liable to the government, liable to proprietors, liable, in short, to everything and everybody except himself. By nature amphibious; at times strutting proudly upon the high and dry land of prosperity, at others wallowing in the muddy waters of misfortune; equally familiar with both, he is philosophically indifferent to either. His habits are luxurious to extravagance. Whether fortune smile or frown, he keeps his carriages and horses; he is a good whip, and if not gouty, riding is his favorite exercise.

In common with other members of the community, he has, however, his mauvais quarts d'heure. Would you see the Impresario in trouble—a cloud of thunder on his brow—the victim of despair? Watch him when he hears that his popular primo tenore or favorite prima donna is indisposed. The opera which is drawing crowded houses has to be changed or sung by a substitute not attractive to the public. The manager may for a while have thrown the reins of government carelessly aside, a flourishing account from the box office having increased his gusto for the good dinner at which he is comfortably seated. A delicate little note is handed to him—whether from a tenor or prima donna does not signify, they both indulge in similarly diminutive-sized envelopes. It is opened; the manager turns pale as he peruses the contents; a few incoherent sentences escape his lips; his dinner and peace of mind for twelve hours at least are irremediably ruined. The delicate little note informs him that a change of opera is unavoidable. The soup is left untouched; he hastens to the theater; his secretary is forthwith despatched to summon other artists; the call-boy runs for his life to the printer; instructions are given to the door-keepers, scene-shifters, in fact, to the entire establishment to prepare for the emergency. A bill is drawn up expressing the regret of the "management" (why the Impresaro insists on calling himself the "management" has never been correctly ascertained) at being obliged to announce a change in the performance of the evening. The secretary returns, after a furious drive to all the outskirts of the metropolis, and finds the manager pacing his room in an agony of disappointment and uncertainty. Sometimes the secretary has been successful, and tranquilizes his chief with words of consolation. Sometimes, however, it is quite the reverse, and he is the bearer of anything but satisfactory intelligence; the artists he has sought may not be found, or, if found, are equally unable to appear as the singer whose illness is the cause of all the difficulty. The Impresario is now in what is popularly called a "quandary," and uncertain whether to open the theater or not. Generally, matters are so arranged that it is unnecessary to resort to the latter alternative; but the Impresario's nerves and temper are made to suffer in the interim. The chances are, moreover, that he is abused by the aristocratic habitués of the stalls and the democratic frequenters of the pit, for not keeping faith with the public; neither aristocrat nor democrat considering for one moment that it is the singer's throat that is sore, and not that of the Impresario, who would willingly sing soprano, contralto, tenor and bass, were it in his power to do so to the satisfaction of the grumblers aforesaid. Strange contretemps will sometimes happen on such occasions. Artists who were not to be found when wanted will arrive at the last moment when others have been persuaded to sing for them.

When it is considered how entirely the fulfillment of the announcement of an opera depends upon the health of the sensitive soprano or tenacious tenor, it is perhaps surprising that disappointments are not more frequent, and that an enterprising Impresario can at any time enjoy his dinner undisturbed. The closing of a theater, or failure of any important undertaking for the amusement of the public, deprives many families of their weekly income, reducing them to want. Singers, actors, and musicians are not the only sufferers, and they are better able to withstand such a misfortune than those employed in the other departments of a theater.

By these inferior officers, the obedience paid to the Manager or "Governor," as he is called, approaches slavery. His orders are obeyed as implicitly and promptly as those of a despot. His sway is absolute, and he issues his edicts with the air and dignity of a monarch. A change of temper in the "Governor" is discussed by the mercenaries with fear or delight as an important event effecting their interests and happiness. The "Governor" smiles and the mercenaries rejoice—he frowns, and they are sad and silent. It is an evil presage, and none dare approach him till he smiles again.

A successful Impresario is rarely met with in the flesh, a statement which, obliviously admitting of two interpretations, may safely be accepted in either sense without fear of contradiction; for prudence dictates silence concerning financial matters on the part of every manager: if he makes money it concerns nobody but himself, if he loses it, the less it is talked about the better. Hence, the fabulous accounts of the profits and losses in theatrical undertakings. They are usually spoken of by those who are entirely ignorant of their true character, and by them exaggerated accordingly. Theatrical and musical affairs seem to be favorite topics with those members of society who delight in making themselves a name for exclusive information on questions of general interest.

By these valiant knights of the long bow it is considered quite justifiable to make the most malignant assertion as to the private life of any public favorite, singer or actor, male or female. They will tell you how they know for a fact that Baroski the tenor was unable to appear last week, owing to his being, as usual, too intoxicated to walk across the stage. Unless those be present who care to contradict the statement, it passes for reliable information, and poor Baroski's reputation suffers in consequence; whereas, if the chatterer be challenged for his authority, it invariably ends in the whole story being disproved, and the listeners convinced of its injustice. The charge of inebriety is one often brought against public singers, although none can be more slanderous and false. The more eminent their position, the more are they exposed to the accusation. A moments reflection should, however, convince any one of common sense that habitual drinking to excess would completely incapacitate a singer or musician from pursuing his vocation. Singers, in fact, have every reason for avoiding such a means of excitement, both for the sake of preserving their voices as well as for sustaining their reputation with the public. Moreover, singing in itself is sufficiently exciting and quite as much so as any vicious stimulant, which must inevitably destroy its effect. Society, however, encourages these idle tales about these artists who happen to be popular, and slander that would be resented and cried down with indignation about a private individual may with impunity be invented and circulated when its victim is a favorite of the public. Although less conspicuous in his position than the maligned tenor, our Impresario is not exempt from these attacks. He, too, has his traducers, though they may not take sufficient interest in his doings to invent stories personally affecting him. Success or failure is the standard by which he is judged. If triumphant, he's the cleverest fellow in the world; if the reverse, he's the greatest fool. In either case he is at any rate as necessary a part of any public performance as music, actors, or musicians. Without a "management" no theatre can be opened, no amusement afforded to the public, and whether it consist of a Board (which is rarely the case and never long so), or is mysteriously represented by an "unknown quantity" such as an Impresario, it must exist, or a theatrical undertaking can have no being.

MILLINERY AND HEAD-DRESSES.—Mrs. Winship has just received, per last steamer, the latest Parisian Millinery Goods and Laces for HEAD-DRESS, consisting in part of Breakfast Caps, Point Application, Lace Valenciennes, and the Widow's Ruche, worn by the crown heads of Europe, and the only first imported to the Pacific Coast. Queen Emma, while here, replenished her wardrobe from the stock then and now on hand, at MRS. WINSHIP, No. 23 Post Street, under the Mechanics' Institute. Through the influence of Queen Emma, Mrs Winship has filled quite a number of orders for the foreign population of Honolulu. The ladies of San Francisco should call and examine these beautiful Goods, by which means they will secure the Latest Fashionable Styles.

WHAT'S THE MATTER?—In passing through Third street yesterday, we saw crowds of people entering a building a few doors below Market street, and we inquired of a passer-by what's the matter? He answered that they were going to have their pictures taken in the NEW YORK PHOTOGRAPHIC GALLERY, and the cause of the rush was that this took the best and cheapest pictures in the city; the inducement must be much to draw so big a crowd from Montgomery and the other streets in the northern part of the city.

MAYER'S BAZAAR.—R. Mayer offers at his Bazaar, corner Pine and Montgomery streets, the greatest variety of jewelry, watches, silver plated ware, guitars, music boxes; concertinas, accordeons, opera glasses, etc., etc., to the public of San Francisco, and to the country trade, at prices that defy competition, and is determined to close out his present stock at greatly reduced rates. His heavy case silver watches from the American Watch Company are superior to anything ever before offered to the public. These watches are taking the place of heavy gold watches from the fact that the workmanship is superior, the casings pure silver, and the prices low. The sale of these watches is very extensive on the Pacific coast. Another proof that American manufacturers can beat the world. The works are made of platina and never get out of repair. French opera glasses of great power for sale or hire, and all kinds of musical instruments, eight day family clocks, etc. This is a rare chance to invest your money to advantage, at Mayer's Bazaar, southeast corner of Montgomery and Pine streets.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

RESOURCES OF CALIFORNIA.

THE MECHANICS' INSTITUTE OF SAN FRANcisco hereby OFFER A PREMIUM OF ONE THOUSAND ($1,000) DOLLARS FOR THE BEST ESSAY ON THE "RESOURCES OF CALIFORNIA, AND BEST METHOD OF DEVELOPING THE SAME," under the following conditions:—One half of the premium in cash on the certified award of the Committee of Judges, and the balance from the first proceeds of sales of the successful work, which is to belong to, and will be published by, the Institute

The Essays are to be handed into the Librarian of the Institute on or before the FIRST DAY OF JUNE, 1868, and the award to be made by the Judges at the opening of the Industrial Exhibition, which is to be held in August or September following. The Essay should be divided into three heads, viz: Mineral, Agricultural and Industrial Resources, with proper subdivisions of each subject. It should be sufficient in quantity to form a duodecimo (12mo) volume of from 250 to 300 pages long primer type solid.

Writers will sign their articles in cypher, and send their names and address in sealed envelopes, which will be kept in a secure place by the Institute, and only be opened when the award is made. The manuscripts of unsuccessful writers will be returned to them without publicity.

The Committee of Judges have the right to reject all Essays, in case they do not consider them worthy of publication or the premium. No further instructions than are contained in this advertisement will be given to the Committee, nor will they be subjected to any advice from the officers or members of the institute in regard to their proposed action. All manuscript submitted must be in clear, legible writing, so as to admit of easy reading.

The following named gentleman, who have been selected for their well-known ability public spirit and integrity of purpose, will compose the Committee of Judges:

Hon. FRED'K. F. LOW,	Maj. Gen. H. W. HALLECK, U. S. A.,
Prof J. D. WHITNEY,	Prof. WM. B. EWER,

About the Fashions.—The materials most in favor now, are those with very small patterns, of two shades of the same colors, or of different tints, in the jardiniére style. Striped petticoats are very much worn with short dresses, and look pretty and stylish. White dresses will be very fashionable this summer, not only white muslin or ganze, but white lawn, mohair; and other light fancy materials; the dress and paletot white, the underskirt colored. The short skirt is indispensable for morning walks, excursions in the country, and residences at sea-side watering places. The new jackets are called Bretonne jackets, and will be much worn at the sea-side. They are made of white cloth, trimed with pinked-out stripes of the same, embroidered in different colors. The Fanchon bonnet seems to be the favorite, although many others are also á la mode. It is difficult to know a bonnet from a hat, just now, both are so small, so round, or, rather, so altogether shapeless; indeed, hats seem to be larger than bonnets' and as the latter very often have no strings tied in front, it renders a decision still more doubtful. Necklaces, with long pendant ornaments, and waistbands to match, are still quite fashionable. Long gilt ear rings are also much in vogne, and the Belgian collar is worn for dinner dress. Chignons grow higher and higher every day. We hope to see them go still higher unti they lose their equilibrium, fall over the front of the head, and disappear entirely.

Amber is desdined to be the fashionable trimming It is to be used on everything, but we fear it will look well on but few things, as it will not accord with all colors. We have seen some very pretty specimens of amber bugle fringe, also amber drops and buttons, which, on a black dress, would be exceeding effective. Jet still holds its ground, and will, for some time to come, as it always looks well, and can be used on any color or materal.

Hair vs. "rats" and "mice."— Some ladies are endeavoring to introdnce in Paris, the fashion of wearing the hair unrestrained and flowing, in what has been called, in England, the "mane" style. Madames de Gallifet and de Pourtalès have both appeared at evening parties with their hair simply held by a small gold bandeau, of antique form set with precious stones. Madame Rimski Korsakow has likewise made her appearance with her hair flowing loosely over her shonlders, but with this difference—it was divided into two portions, and fastened together with a string of pearls. Madame Rimski Korsakow is certain to find a host of copyists.

A newly arrived boarder at one of our fashionable boarding houses, though he had not sufficient bolstering for his head, and accordngly carried the pillows down to the landlady's room, who inquired what he desired. The gentleman wanted to know what the articles were which he held in his hands. "Pillows you impndent fellow!" screamed the enraged woman. "Oh! I though they were pin cushions!" replied the disconsolata boarder.

The Superintendent of a Sunday School in Hartford, Conn., recently made his annual report, in which he recommended that the adult members should go to work and do all in their power to increase the infant class in his school during the coming year.

Kisses between women are like two handsome unmatched gloves—charming things with their proper mates, but good for nothing in that way.

"My opinon is," said a philosophical old lady of much experience and observation, "that any man as dies upon washing day, does it out of pure spite."

"My dear husband, am I not your only treasure?" "Certainly, and I should like to lay you up in heaven."

"Shure, which is the intrance out?" asked an Irishman at the music hall.

ANOTHER DOCTOR IN THE CITY.

DR. H. A. BENTON has been performing many wonderful cures in this city the past two years, and as his practice is fast increasing at the office, finds it difficult to attend outside calls, concluded to invite R. H. OLMSTEAD, M D., of Napa City, to join him. Dr. Olmstead has been 18 years successfully treating obstinate cases, with water, electricity, and the magnetic forces, (and when needed, Eclectic Remedies, of which he is a graduate of that school); also, being the seventh son of a celebrated Physician, and having a powerful organization, his magnetic hands, like magic, dispel pain and disease in a wonderful manner; he is also a natural Bone Setter.

DR. OLMSTEAD has this day associated with Dr. H. A. BENTON, the Medical Electrician and Homœpathist, at his office, 314 Bush street, San Francisco, who, having all the necessary facilities, such as the Patent Electro-Chemical, Sulphur, Vapor, Hot Air, and Medicated Baths, which are valuable aids in removing all curable diseases, whether acute or chronic. The combined skill, together with the aid of an excellent Lady Assistant, gives an assurance of CURE TO MANY, BENEFIT TO ALL, AND INJURY TO NONE.

N. B.—Terms within reach of all. Office hours from 9 A. M. to 8 P. M. Sundays, by appointment.

NATURAL SUCTION PUMP.—Livingstone, the African traveler, describes an ingenious method by which the Africans obtain water in the desert: "The women tie a bunch of grass to one end of a reed about two feet long, and insert it in a hole dug as deep as the arm will reach then ram down the wet sand firmly around it. Applying the mouth to the free end of the reed, they form a vacuum in the grass beneath, in which the water collects, and in a short time rises to the mouth. It will be perceived that this simple but truly philosophical and effectual method might have been applied in many cases in different countries where water was greatly needed to the saving of life. It seems wonderful that it should have been now first known to the world, and that it should have been habitually practiced in Africa, probably for centuries. It seems worthy of being particularly noticed, that it may be highly important to travelers in our deserts and prairies, on some parts of which water is kown to exist below the surface."

A CLOSE fellow remarked to a friend that he saw a pitiable sight when he took his morning walk, and he couldn't help feeling for the starving child. His friend inquired how much he was influenced by his feelings to give. He answered that he controlled his feelings.

ALMOST every critic who speaks of "Mark Twain's" book, praises its correct spelling—not because faulty orthography is a weakness of our literature, but because so many humorous books have been written in the Artemus Ward manner that it is a positive comfort to meet something which is funny with sober spelling.

THE Buffalo Commercial tells the story of a man from the country who called at a hardware store in that city, and after being shown a large assortment of scissors, turned to the clerk, remarking: "My wife's putty sick, and it's 'bout an even thing if she gets any better; guess I'll wait and see if she gets well 'fore I bny any scissors."

MISS BUCHANAN, once rallying her cousin, an officer, on his courage, said: "Now, Mr. Harry, do you really mean to tell me you can walk up to a cannon's mouth without fear? "Yes," was the prompt reply, "or a Buchanan's either." And he did it.

WHAT is the worst seat a man can sit on? Self-conceit,

GRAND TRIAL
....OF....
SEWING MACHINES,

CONTEST BETWEEN THE FLORENCE AND WILLCOX & GIBBS.

THE
WILLCOX & GIBBS
TRIUMPHANT!

At the Great UNION FAIR, held at Island Park, between Albany and Troy, in September, two Premiums were offered on Sewing Machines, one for the BEST and the other for the "Second Best"—competition being open to the State.

On the first day of the Fair, the Troy Agent of Florence Sewing Machine Company, having, jointly with the Albany Agent of the same Machine, entered it for competition, published in the Troy Daily Times a challenge to Agents of other Sewing Machines, to meet them at said Fair and compete with them for the Premium.

The challenge was accepted by the Troy and Albany Agents of the Willcox and Gibbs Machine.

Each party was to prepare and subject to the judges a "list" of the several "points of merit" on account of which "superiority" was claimed. These "points" were to be separately considered, thoroughly investigated and practically tested, by work done then and there, upon each of the machines; and then decided in favor of the machine which was adjudged to excel on that "point."

Finally it was agreed that the machine which, at the conclusion of the trial, should be found to have the greatest number of those "points" decided in its favor should be decided the "BEST SEWING MACHINE," and awarded the FIRST PREMIUM.

The result of the trial was, that the

WILLCOX & GIBBS WON THE VICTORY

and the prize, by the extraordinary superiority of thirty-five points, decided in its favor, against two points in favor of the Florence.

Full notes were taken of the trial.

It is a fact worthy of remark, that during the entire trial—which continued without intermission for nearly seven hours—not a stitch was missed, nor the thread once broken, nor a needle broken or bent, by the Willcox and Gibbs machine. No kind of work was attempted to be done on it that was not accompliseed, and done in a perfect and workmanlike manner: and no effort was made on it that was not entirely successful; while neither of these statements can be truly made in favor of the Florence.

This remarkable trial can not fail, through the facts developed by it, to be productive of important results. It has raised the veil and exposed to public view the true character of the opposition, who will no longer be able to deceive the public by misrepresenting the character and merits of the Willcox and Gibbs machine.

It is an improvement on double thread machines; and its "stitch," which was severely tested by the Judges, was decided to be much stronger and less liable to rip in use or wear than the "Lock Stitch."

It is the simplest in construction—does the greatest variety of work—makes no noise—is not liable to get out of order—costs the least money, and gives the the best satisfaction.

Full reports of this trial sent free to any address.

A Sea Yarn.—During a passage from Calcutta to Boston. says an old ex-sea captain, I noticed that one of my crew, an able seaman and a thorough sailor, was inclined to grumble at every order issued from the qnarter deck. If a rope was tonched, a sail clewed up or clewed down, Jack was sure to growl and swear that the vessel was the "bloodiest ship he ever sailed in or ever expected to." A true-hearted Jack tar will always grumbe, but my man was a little the worse for complaining that I ever sailed with, so I determined to take an original method of curing the cuss of a bad habit which would soon spread through the forecastle and make the ship nncomfortable for officers and men.

One morning while the decks were being washed down, I heard Jack growling at the amount of water which was used. I called the fellow to me, and said in a quiet tone:

"Jack, you don't like to work. Now, as we are strong-handed, and the weather is fine, yon just go forward. Eat, drink, and sleep, but don't you raise your hand to do any work."

The man looked astonished, but went forward, and I forgot him nntil the next morning, when the steward told me that jack refused to eat anything, and swore that he would starve himself to death. I sent for the man to come aft, when he stood before me I said—

"So yon have disobeyed my orders, have you?"

"I don't know that I have," was the snllen reply.

"Didn't I tell you to eat, drink and sleep?" I demanded.

"Yes sir."

"And yet you refuse to eat. How is that?"

"Well, sir, I'll be d——d if you or any other man can make me eat unless I do my share of work. I'll starve first."

"Then go to work and quit grumbling," I said; and the man went forward as happy as a crew on pay day, and I never heard a growl from his lips afterwards, or from one of the men.

THE AVITOR "HERMES."

The following Report has been addressed to the Pattentee of the Avitor, by G. K. Gluyas, Esq., President of the Mechanic's Institue, and Superintending Engineer of the California S. N. Company.

Report of the Construction and Prospects of the

"AVITOR:"

SAN FRANCISCO, June 7, 1867

F. MARRIOTT, ESQ—Dear Sir:—Having visited on Wednesday last, the Avitor building, at Belt Mound Park, and inspected the machine, I take the pleasure in recording my impressions in favor of this invention. I was careful to learn details, and to study the Avitor, in order to speak, so far as I might be, with knowledge; and I am satisfied that the principle here followed is the right one.

The machine is light, solid and well finished. I think there is needed greater capacity for holding of gas, and a modification of the machine to enable it to be compressed, that the gas-holder may the more readily be filled with pure gas. The arrangements for controlling and managing the different portions of the machinery could not be better; the engine I think adequate to perform all the services required of it. As regards the probable velocity of the Avitor, I would say nothing. Once afloat, and I see nothing to hinder its floating; it is merely a question of resistance. For an invention so novel, the Avitor has met with comparatively few practical obstacles; and when it is remembered that the difficulties in the way of Fulton's experiment were much greater than those that have kept back the Avitor, and that the principal is in both cases equally sound it will be seen that there are good reasons for the belief that the machine, with the modifications referred to, will yet successfully navigate the air.

The experiments with petroleum as a steam generator, which, no doubt, will be successful, will furnish a compact and light fuel for generating steam. After the Avitor has been floated, there may be some slight changes of the propelling machinery suggested, but, ultimately, it must be a success. The expense to make the contemplated changes, or rather enlargement, of the machine, I think, will be under three thousand dollars.

Hoping and firmly believing in the success of your enterprise, I remain your obedient servant,

GEO. K. GLUYAS.

OPINION OF PETER DONAHUE ESQ.

I have followed with great interest, and have personally observed the construction of the Avitor. I am so thoroughly convinced of the practicability of the enterprise, and so entirely concur in the foregoing observations of Geo. K. Gluyas, Esq., respecting the two modifications to be adopted, that I have no hesitation in saying that, when these changes are made, the Avitor will answer all the purposes of its inventor, and fully realize the expectations of the public. As soon as the elevating power shall, in this way, have been perfected, the work will be completed because the propeling force is ample, the machinery for elevating and depressing sufficient, and steering apparatus in fine working order, and, in short, the whole of the Avitor is fully under the control of the operation. Ayer's Sarsaparilla
TO
Purify the Blood.
NOT A FEW OF THE WORST DISORDERS THAT afflict mankind arise from the corruption that accumulates in the blood. Of all the discoveries that have been made to purge it out, none have been found which could equal in effect AYER'S COMPOUND EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. It cleanses and renovates the blood, instills the vigor of health into the system and purges out the humors which make disease. It stimulates the healthy functions of the body, and expels the disorders that grow and rankle in the blood. Its extraordinary virtues are not yet widely known, but, when they are, it will no longer be a question what remedy to employ in the great variety of afflicting diseases that require an alterative remedy. Such a remedy, that could be relied on, has long been sought for, and now, for the first time, the public have one on which they can depend. Our space here does not admit certificates to show its effects. But the trial of a single bottle will show to the sick that it has virtues surpassing anything they have ever taken. Sufferers from Scrofula, scrofulous Swellings and Sores, try it and see the rapidity with which it cures. Skin Diseases, Pimples Pustules, Blotches, Eruptions, etc., are soon cleaned out of the system.
St. Anthony's Fire, Rose or Erysipelas, Tetter or Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Ringworm, etc., should not be borne while they can be so speedily cured by AYER'S SARSAPARILLA.
Syphilis or Venereal Disease is expelled from the system by the prolonged use of this SARSAPARILLA, and the patient is left as healthy as if he never had the disease.
Female Diseases are caused by Scrofula in the blood, and are generally soon cured by this EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. Price $1 per bottle, or 6 bottles for $5.
For all the purposes of a family physic, take AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS, which are everywhere known to be the best purgative that is offered to the American People.
Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass., and sold by all Druggists and dealers in medicine everywhere.

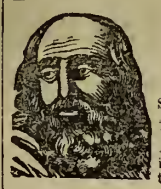
TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

NEW REMEDIES! NEW REMEDIES!

Dr. Gibbon's Dispensary.



ESTABLISHED IN 1854,
616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco.

For the treatment of Sexual and Seminal Diseases, such as gonorrhœa, gleet, stricture, syphilis in all its forms, seminal weakness, impotency, &c. Skin Diseases, (of years' standing,) and Ulcerated legs, successfully treated.

HORRIBLE DISEASES.

How many thousands of persons both male and female are there who are suffering out a miserable existence from the effects of secret indulgence, or from virus absorbed into the system. Look at their pallid, emaciated and disfigured faces, and their broken constitutions, disqualifying them for the happiness of marriage or the enjoyment of life. In this horrid situation thousands suffer until death closes the scene. Let parents, guardians and friends, attend to those who are suffering with any of these horrible, life-destroying maladies—see that they are cared for and cured before it be too late. Send them to Dr. Gibbon, a physician who has made private diseases his especial study for years, and who is certain to cure the most inveterate cases without mercury or any injurious drugs. It is important to those who are afflicted, to be careful of the many pretended Doctors who infest all cities, publishing their skill in curing all diseases in a few days, imposing upon the public by using the names of eminent physicians from Europe and other places. Be therefore careful and make strict inquiry, or you may fall into the hands of these charlatans.

Syphilis is syphilis the world over ; so is small pox, consumption, and other diseases, to the contrary of what quacks may say.

SEMINAL WEAKNESS.

Seminal weakness the consequent of self abuse. This solitary vice, or depraved sexual indulgence, is practiced by the youth of both sexes to an almost unlimited extent, producing with unnerving certainty the following train of morbid symptoms, unless combatted by scientific medical measure ; sallow countenances, dark spots under the eyes, pain in the head, ringing in the ears, noise like the rustling of leaves and rattling of chariots, uneasines about the loins, weakness of the limbs, confused vision, blunt intellect, loss of confidence, diffidence in approaching strangers, a dislike to form new acquaintances, a disposition to shun society, loss of memory, hectic flushes, pimples and various eruptions about the face, furred tongue, fetid breath, coughs, consumption, night sweats, monomania, and frequent insanity. If relief be not obtained, should apply immediately, either in person or by letter, and have a cure effected by his new and scientific mode of treating this complaint, which never fails of effecting a quick and radical cure. Dr. G. will give $100 to any person who will prove satisfactorily to him that he was cured by either of the San Francisco quacks.

Dr. Gibbon is responsible, and will give each patient a written instrument binding himself to effect a radical and permanent cure or make no charge.

Persons at a distance may be cured at home by addressing a letter to Dr. Gibbon, stating case, symptoms length of time the disease has continued, and have medicine promptly forwarded, free from damage and curiosity, to any part of the country, with full and plain directions for use, for ten dollars, sent in a registered letter, or through Wells, Fargo & Co.

Address DR. J. F. GIBBON, 616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco, Postoffice Box 252.

CAUTION TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

Beware of the San Francisco quacks and pretenders who with bogus sworn-to certificates, dupe the unwary. Some of the self styled doctors whose names are to be found in all the daily and weekly papers of San Francisco and other places, are tradesmen, and become too lazy to work at their trade. Some are tinsmiths, shoemakers, newspaper carriers, intelligence offices keepers, etc. Look over the San Francisco City Directory and you will find their former occupation in it. Look at the Directory for 1862-63. The only way to avoid imposition is make inquiry—it will cost you nothing and may save you many regrets, for advertising physicians in eight cases out of ten are bogus, there is no safety in trusting any of them till you know who and what they are. Dr. Gibbon does not deceive people by exhibiting bogus titles, certificates, pretended patients' letters, etc. Dr. Gibbon will satisfy persons who may call at his office of his ability to treat diseases that he proposes to cure.

☞ Persons writing to Dr. Gibbon will Please state the name of the paper they see his advertisement in.

CHASTELLAR'S

HAIR EXERMINATOR, FOR REMOVING

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR.

TO THE LADIES ESPECIALLY, THIS INVALUABLE depilatory recommends itself as being an almost indispensable article to female beauty, is easily applied, does not burn or injure the skin, but acts directly on the roots. It is warranted to remove superfluous hair from low foreheads, or from any part of the body, completely, totally and radically extirpating the same, leaving the skin soft, smooth and natural. This is the only article used by the French, and is the only real effectual depilatory in existence. Price 75 cents per package, sent post paid, to any address, on receipt of an order by

BERGER, SHUTTS & CO., Chemists,
285 River street, Troy, N. Y.

There cometh glad tidings of joy to all,
To young and old, to great and to small;
The beauty which was once so precious and rare,
Is free for all, and all may be fair.

By the use of

CHASTELLAR'S

WHITE LIQUID ENAMEL,

FOR IMPROVING AND BEAUTIFYING THE COMplexion.

The most valuable and perfect preparation in use, for giving the skin a beautiful pearl-like tint, that is only found in youth. It quickly removes Tan, Freckles, Pimples, Blotches, Moth Patches, Sallowness, Eruptions, and all impurities of the skin, kindly healing the same, leaving the skin white and clear as alabaster. Its use cannot be detected by the closest scrutiny, and being a vegetable preparation is perfectly harmless. It is the only article of the kind used by the French, and is considered by the Parisian as indispensable to a perfect toilet. Upwards of 30,000 bottles were sold during the past year, a sufficient guarantee of its efficacy. Price only 75 cents. Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of order, by

In the matter of the Estate of SARAH P. PETERSON, deceased.

Order to show cause why order of distribution should not be made.

On reading and filing the petition of Frederick W. Peterson the Administrator of the Estate of Sarah P. Peterson deceased, setting forth that he has filed his final account of his administration of the estate of said deceased, in this Court, and that the same has been duly settled and allowed; that all the debts and expenses of administration have been duly paid; and that a portion of said estate remains to be divided among the heirs of said deceased, and praying among other things for an order of distribution of the residue of said estate among the persons entitled:

It is Ordered, that all persons interested in the estate of the said Sarah P. Peterson deceased, be and appear before the Probate Court of the city and county of San Francisco, at the Court Room of said Court, in the City Hall in said city and county, on MONDAY, the fifteenth day of July, A. D. 1867, at eleven o'clock, A. M., then and there to show cause why an order of distribution should not be made of the residue of said estate to the heir of said Sarah P. Peterson deceased, according to law:

It is further Ordered, that a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks, before the said fifteenth day of July A D. 1867, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in the said city and county.

A RARE GEM OF ART.

"The Lord's Prayer,"

A pen drawing, by Mr. D. F. Brown, is one of the most remarkable works of art ever exhibited in this country. By patient labor he has succeeded in producing a design which for skill and beauty of execution, exquisite softness and delicacy of finish, and general merit, it would seem scarcely possible to surpass. The central figure—the face of our savior—is one of marvelous power and beauty This and the faces of the Twelve Apostles, forming the border of the piece, are faithful copies from Leonardo da Vinci's famous painting of the

LAST SUPPER,

Re-producing, with the softest and most perfect shadings the conceptions and characteristic expressions of the originals. Within this enclosure the words of the Lord's Prayer, in ornamental letters of various original designs and exquisite finish, are an interesting study of art in themselves; while appropriately distributed among these, miniature groups and scenes of marked events of Savior's life, copied from the great masters—five of them from Rapbel a celebrated designs—form a harmonious completion of this unique, beautiful and truly wonderful work. The faces of

OUR LORD AND HIS APOSTLES.

Alone, so finely copied, would be a treasure in any house, and worth the full price of subscription.

BABBITTONIAN,

OR SELF-TEACHING

PENMANSHIP!

The System of Babbitonian Penmanship is pre-eminently self-instructing. With its ample explanations of right and wrong forms—its sixty wood cuts—its plain intelligent rules, one may sit down by his own fireside and become a finer Penman than he could at much greater cost in the usual way with a living teacher.

There is a great demand for fine Penmen in the commercial world, and this system, at a trifling expense, imparts a skillful command of the Pen, worth hundreds of dollars to the fortunate possessor.

Penmanship is an indispensable accomplishment to Ladies, and this system is elaborate in a series of elegant copies in the Ladies' Style.

Business men have sometimes lost thousands of dollars from ignorance in regard to Business forms, and there is furnished in a set, without additional charge, a fine variety of Business Forms and Abbreviations. To sum up the Excellencies of this System, it is—

1—Scientific in its Arrangement of Principles;
2—Artistic in its Movements and Flourishes;
3—Practical in its Combinations and Applications;
4—Stylish in its neat and chaste Gracefulness;
5—Superior for Legibility, Rapidity and Beauty:
6—Most Disciplinary for fingers, Arms and Muscles.
7—Unexcelled for Comprehensiveness and Simplicity.
8—Complete and Self-Teaching for Private Learners;
9—Time, Labor and Expense Saving for Pupils and Teachers.

The Babbitonian Penmanship

Is published on durable card-board slips, ninety-two copies illustrated, put in a neat package with a Chart, the whole complete at the low price of $1 50.

Babbittonian Pens.

One reason why the country is flooded with poor Pens is that they are generally made by mechanics, rather than by artistic and experienced Penmen, the only parties really understanding the requirements of a good article.

The Babbittonian Pens,

Made in the most finished style, by skillful artisans, after models prepared according to the combined wisdom and experience of several amateurs and old Professors of Penmanship, are admirably adapted to meet the public wants.

The Babbittonian Ladies' Pen,

Is one of the most exquisite little instruments for delicate writing ever constructed.

The Babbittonian Extra Fine Pen,

Is pronounced by a large number of Penmen to be more free, more durable, and more varied in capacity for either fine or coarse strokes than any foreign Pen whatever. Suitable for elegant writing, it is a great favorite with the ladies and gentlemen.

The Babbittonian Business Pen,

Having great freedom and variety of movement, is unequaled for general business or school purposes. Somewhat coarser than the Extra Fine, it wears longer and moves more easily on paper.

☞ This Pen is now in use in the large counting-houses and banks in this city.

Popular Opera.

We rejoice to perceive the growing taste for Italian Opera in this city. There is a taste for opera, but it still requires careful nourishing. It is a matter of importance that it be carefully shielded from rude shocks, which might hinder its growth, or perhaps, even kill it. We wish the growth of this sentiment to be healthy, we are averse to seeing it forced by unnatural stimulants; it is, therefore, we call attention to an announcement made in the Italian Opera company's programme, published in the daily papers, which is calculated to mislead many. Among the operas announced, is one called "Mose." We regret to state that the nature of this opera has been very generally misunderstood. Jake Cheesy, who used to run with No. 5, in the good old volunteer days, on observing that "Mose" was among the operas to be played, said to a friend: "There, Bill, that's the kind of opera to gain the support of the public. None of your I-talian nonsense, but a real American composition, made right in New York." Bill was not posted on the libretto of "Mose," and asked Jake if he was sure that this opera was not Italian. Jake replied, "Sure! Well, I guess so. I board in the same house as one of the chorus, and he keeps me posted. This "Mose" is a regular rip-roaring, screaming fireman's opera. They 're going to have real engines on the stage, and Charley Schultz' Fireman's March is to be played, and it will seem like old times. I'm going to get reserved seats for that night, you bet." Bill, after this description of the opera, pledged himself to go also, and take his "gal," though he had not before intended to patronize the opera at all, in consequence of seeing L'Africaine, which he understood to be an amalgamation nigger-equality piece announced for representation. We wish to see the new season of Italian opera succeed. But its success must be caused by fair means. It might, perhaps, gladden the hearts of the management, if the Academy of Music were on the occasion of the first representation of Moses in Egypt crowded with members of the late Fire Department, but such success would be but but temporary. Perhaps none but San Francisco daily newspapers would have ventured to thus irreverently contract the name of the law-giver of Israel, but it is nevertheless a fact that "Mose" is the original "Moses." The only excuse that can be found for these papers, lies in the supposition that they thought "Mose" was the Italian for "Moses."

"My Fellow-Man."

Judge Axtell made a very funny speech on Thursday evening before the Working men's Convention at Dashaway Hall. The judge went the entire animal in his glorification of labor. Speaking of the Hon. T. G. Phelps, who spoke first, Judge Axtell said in an apologetic and rather sorrowful tone of voice:

"Like my opponent, I, too, was raised to labor, but have since been admitted to the Bar. But that makes no difference. The man who carries the hod is the peer of any man in the country."

Poor Judge Axtell! It is sad that he should have been admitted to the bar when content to be an honest laborer. "But that makes no difference." Judge Axtell is a great lover of his fellow-men, with Terence he says: "Homo sum et humani a me nil alienum puto;" but he would amend it by the addition of the adjective album, nothing white and human can fail to interest Judge Axtell. He says:

"I love my fellow-man too much to give any countenance to anything that is calculated to bring disgrace upon the white man.

The learned judge is certainly particular to a shade, he believes the white hod-carrier to be the peer of any man, but Confucius, Alexandre Dumas, or the Tycoon of Japan could never be considered as fellow men by white Judge Axtell.

Re-opening of the Public Schools.

On Monday last, there was a grand movement among the youth of this city. School books, slates, and all the paraphanalia of the scholar were once more taken in hand, and between the hours of eight and nine A. M., hundreds of the men and women of 1876 might have been seen on their way to the different public school edifices. Passing by Lincoln Palace, we stopped a moment to gaze at a long line of juveniles being marched by their teachers into the school room. They were apparently nearly of the same age and height. To a casual observer, this lot of little boys looked as if they had been turned out per order, in some establishment. And about the outside entrances, parents were urging and endeavoring to drive refractory offspring into this huge infant educational corral. Poor little children! The vacation had ended. They had played themselves out. As we looked on, a parent came up and also peeped in. He smiled with satisfaction. He said, "I've got four in there." He could look on that struggling, squirming mass of juvenile humanity, part of whom were singing "Old John Brown," and the rest "The Battle Cry of Freedom," and complacently say, "I've got four in there." Too many children so closely packed, to us conveyed a sensation of hot and perspiratory discomfort. We are not a parent, nor ever shall be in this world "as we know of," and consequently don't know how a parent feels at any stage of his or her existence; yet, were we a parent, even so much as an uncle or an aunt to a nephew or a neice, we should feel sorry to see them driven into such a crowd. Still, the public schools are a great credit to the city, and so also are the public school teachers. For unto them is given all knowledge and all wisdom, and a comprehension of all things. A public school teacher knows everything. He can perform any problem found in the common mathematics, answer any question in English grammar, or geography or history, or anything else, liberty at the same time being given to have said question or questions, propounded by any natural born fool, (and natural born fools can ask more difficult questions than any other class of people). He can do this and not half try, either. Some public school teachers are fearfully and wonderfully made, and sometimes cut up such antics as to cause a great deal of commotion among the angelic hosts above.

The Democratic Ratification.

The Democratic ratification meeting, on Tuesday evening, at Union Hall, was simply a chaos of wandering men and shuffling feet. Why did our Democratic friends change the speakers' platform from the end to the side of the hall? Was it because they could not occupy a platform in common with the Republicans? Perhaps three hundred Democrats heard the speakers, and there were at least fifteen hundred Democrats, who, having ears, heard not, because the Democrats having charge of the necessary arrangements did not understand the principles of acoustics. The feeling which filled every mind after once entering the brilliantly lighted hall, was an intense desire to get out again in the open air as quickly as possible. And they did get out. We never before witnessed a grand political demonstration where there existed such an intense desire to get out. A peep and a sniff (for ventilation had not been properly looked after, as it should have been when the great unterrified and unwashed assemble to howl over their wrongs) was enough for a large majority. The entrance was crowded for hours with out-goers. Compared with this exodus that of the Israelites was a mere vestry meeting.

There seemed to us many ominous peculiarities about this demonstration. A band, heading one of the Ward Clubs, came in playing "Yankee Doodle." The air was massacred. It wouldn't play. It seemed as if it was frightened and trying to get out of the hall as fast as possible. The floor was very slippery, too. Democrats could not stand stand up easily. Some went down. Many do on such occasions.

The Rev. Mr. Scudder was in the crowd wearing a seedy coat. What wore he a seedy coat for? a coat ripped under the elbows? Because he had heard of the belligerent tendencies of Democratic meetings. He did not know that much of the combative element has gone over to the Republican party. But he looked amused and jubilant. Why? Did he see the handwriting on the wall? Perhaps he did and in Hindostanee, at that.

The Heated Term.

A number of individuals, on Sunday last, who never before in their lives were known to pronounce definitely on anything, said in a decided manner, "it is hot." The superabundance of natural caloric, actually brought out a positive opinion on their part.

Well, it certainly was very trying weather; as an old whaleman might say it, came near trying us all out.

A general feeling of nausea prevailed. This, in many cases, was caused by excess of soda water and ice cream. Those who did not partake of soda water and ice cream, were influenced sympathetically. Many partook largely of beer; others of brandy. Brandy seems available for both heated and cold terms. Cross people became unbearable; patient people stopped over and became cross. Demonstrative people swore outwardly; undemonstrative people swore inwardly, and proportionately more wickedly, as they restrained their irritability. San Francisco takes more kindly to earthquakes than hot weather.

"Fifth" Thoughts on "the Fourth."

The Fourth came and went. Everybody was glad: the maturer people, because the noise, turmoil, confusion, dust, dirt and racket were over. The juveniles became excessively tired in their search for enjoyment. In most cases, the reality did not justify the anticipation. There were some dirty, ragged, penniless little boys, who either stole their fire crackers or snatched them from packs thrown by extravagant youths in the street. They had a "good Fourth." They had nothing to lose, and everything to gain, and they gained it.

A great number of country people were in town on this "ever glorious day." Tired, worn women, with recklessly dressed children, and youths and men encased in shroud-like linen wrappers. They came "to town" and paid heavy prices for their own fruit, a trifle stale, which a few days before was fresh in their own orchards.

Our "citizen soldiery" did their duty well. It is not so nice to be a soldier on the Fourth of July, to be in readiness, armed and equipped at your armory at 8 o'clock A. M., to stand in the sun two or three hours waiting for the procession, to march two or three hours more, showing your peripatetic qualities to your wives, your innumerata's, your daughters and your olive branches, to endure hunger and thirst, and corns, and, mayhap, tight boots, to feel your gun growing one pound heavier every hour, to perspire mightily, and become inflamed under your bear-skin shako, to endure the temporary importance of some poppet of an officer. All these things are the inheritance of a citizen soldier without much chance of ever dying a glorious death upon the battle-field, or of having it said of you on your tombstone, "Here lies the gallant Smith who fell," etc.

You are more apt, my Metropolitan Son of Mars, to fall at some corner grocery—you are, indeed.

The Fourth is over, and sleeps in silence. There is no more pocket money left with young Samuel. There will be none for some time to come. The yard is free from the warlike smell of fire crackers, and the miniature artillery is silent. In a few days all that waste of red paper will have vanished from the streets and sidewalks. To-day, grim, soiled boys are picking up rocket sticks and Roman candle cases. These are but temporary treasures. Their value is fleeting. An occasional report is heard. Some over prudent boy hoarded his means too closely on The Day, and vainly tries to coerce himself into the delusion that the long looked for celebration still lasts.

To son Samuel, the Fourth was divided into six epochs. First came the getting up in the morning, awakened by the gladsome sound of pops and explosions, the dressing in haste, the breakfast quickly swallowed. The Fourth was here, its minutes were golden, not one must be lost.

Second, the going forth into the streets, the survey of window and housetops, dressed with flags, the commencement of pyrotechnic expenditure, and the awaiting of the procession.

Third, the procession, the grand event of the day. Disappointment is apt to be son Samuel's lot, from the fact that the view thereof is intercepted by the inconvenient legs of grown men, and voluminous skirts of women.

The fourth epoch is a dreary period, extending from the termination of the procession even unto the going down of the sun. Son Samuel applies himself resolutely to crackers and cake, but he cannot shake off a sensation of weariness and lassitude. Even a boy's capacity for enjoyment is limited. He is really tired of the heat, turmoil and confusion. But he cannot give up one minute of the Fourth to rest. It is too precious. So he continues to celebrate, to endure, to become cross and fractious. At this time quarrels begin to arise between him and his bosom friend. They separate. Each then celebrates on his own responsibility. Each "paddles his own canoe" while commemorating the deeds of his forefathers. Son Samuel will not acknowledge to himself that he is tired, even of the celebration.

The fifth epoch is the witnessing of the fire-works, purchased by a patriotic city government to please the governed and Samuel; located "for fun" in the most inconvenient place which can be picked out by human skill. Tired Samuel packs himself into a street car, filled with patriotic men and women, some of whom are possessed with other than the spirit of "'76." He arrives upon the grounds. His youthful legs, tired with the task of supporting Samuel's head and trunk through the various phases of the celebration, bend, ache, and tremble under the rest of Samuel.

Samuel saw the fire works, but much more, he saw and felt sand; sand in his shoes, his eyes, his pockets. He felt that, in the location of the pyrotechnic display, the committee built their house upon sand.

Sixthly, he went to bed.

A Real Estate Speculator.

We fear that the potentates of Europe will become alarmed at the mania for buying real estate, which has of late possessed Uncle Sam. The old gentleman has purchased Russian America, and is at present reported to be engaged in trying to buy the Sandwich Islands. Uncle Sam is making money fast, and possibly he may, in course of time, save up enough money to buy all the desirable real estate on this planet. Perhaps he might be able to buy Ireland cheap; we are sure that England would let him have it at a bargain, if he would immediately tow it across the Atlantic.

THE FATE OF MARSTON BROTHERS.

BY JAMES C. BURTON.

PART THE FIRST.

PROLOGUE.

AN inquest at a mean public house by the water is not so rare or so remarkable an event that people should be very curious about the facts of the case. When the body of William Marston, of the firm of Marston Brothers, was found on the sand and mud of a wild and desolate point among the windings of the river, far below the bridge, the coroner was apprised of his duty, the jurors were summoned, and the usual verdict of "suicide during a fit of temporary insanity," ended the affair as far as the requirements of the law were concerned.

The body was removed to the house of the deceased, where some business friends arranged for the interment. If the undertaker did not make a good thing out of the funeral it was his own fault. He had the sole management of it, was the sole follower—the sole mourner—and he rode after the body, in the solitary, lumbering plume-covered coach that followed, alone. There were no near relations, and of all the acquaintances of the wealthy deceased, not one could be persuaded to follow him to the grave.

There was a reason for this? Yes. The same reason that led those who knew him to leave his lonely grave in the great cemetery with no other mark on it than the initials M. W., and the date of his death; the same reason that led his friends to think it kindest of the dead and to the living to obliterate his very name from remembrance.

The reason was a written confession, contained in a paper taken wet and pulpy from the breast-pocket of the deceased, the writing on which, when dried and pressed, was barely decipherable. Had it never been deciphered, the dead man would have had a very different burial.

If the manuscript is now published, it is not to revive the memory of the dead, but to point the lesson that there is no such thing as unpunished crime in this world, because crime is its own punishment; and that any punishment we may inflict is less severe than that which our evil passions themselves work out.

The manuscript follows:

THE CONFESSION.

My brother Francis, my senior by fourteen years, at my father's death was left executor, entrusted with the responsibility of completing my education and bringing me up to business. Gravely assuming this trust, he arranged that I should remain for the present at the free school at Bedford—to which I was entitled to go from having been born in that town—while he proceeded to wind up the estate, and realize what little property there was. Francis then went to London to found our old established firm, at No. 29A. Great St. Helen's, Bishopgate. It was Marston Brothers at that time, though for three years he was there alone. It is Marston Brothers now, though Francis has been dead for twenty-five years. While at school I always thought my brother very successful, for he wrote me cheerful letters from time to time, and confirmed my impressions of his prosperity by continually sending me money and presents. When, however, at the age of sixteen, I left school to take my place at the office desk, I found this was not so.

The first entry in our journal is, "1832, Sept. 4, To capital account, £831 3s. 10d." this being the sum which remained after the settlement of my father's affairs. From a careful examination of the books referring to this period I have no reason to doubt that Francis was much more assiduous in the business at that time than I have ever been since. But industry and perseverence are not always the conditions of success. I have good grounds, also, for believing that he strove his best to alter the style of the firm on our doorpost from "Marston Brothers, commission agents," to "Marston Brothers, merchants," before I joined him actively in the undertaking. It is fair to say I attributed his efforts in this direction to a not unnatural anxiety lest it should seem as if he were indebted to a lad so much his junior for ever so small a share in his success. I always felt him to be a selfish man, and jealous lest I should do anything for myself or him which should destroy my sense of dependence on my elder brother. It made no difference to me that I was the object for which he would work and strive. Of course, it is better to give than to receive—by just so much as the arrogant pride of giving exalts you above the base servility of the receiver. It was, I believe, the consciousness of servile dependence of my brothers kindness that first stirred up my heart against him when we came together.

It was not likely Francis could have succeeded in business with his precise and Quakerish notions of things. He would never speculate; and he knew nothing at all of the first principles of "financing." When, therefore, we became involved in difficulties almost disastrous, through the failure of respectable city firms, until it was only by the exercise of the most pinching economy we could live at all and pay our way, I certainly felt that he was not only wrong in the course he took, but that he was wronging me. Here were city firms losing money. Well, somebody must get it. Why not we? There is never a bank breaks but somebody is the better off for picking up the pieces. Opportunities were not wanting, but Francis stood aloof, refusing to enrich himself at the expense of other people. He always was a simpleton in business. As if anybody was ever likely to get rich at the expense of other people.

It was the eighth year of our history as Marston Brothers, and we had labored together for five of them—years of uphill toil, during which misfortunes seemed but to thicken around us, entailing continued hardships in our mode of life, of which Francis still bore the principal share.

I hated him for arrogating to himself, by his very self-denial, a position above me; and he stood in my way—in the way of success, in the way of wealth.

We were trying gradually to change the character of our house without relinquishing the commission business, by exporting at first small quantities of home produce, and receiving in return consignments of raw material from our correspondents abroad. Why do I say we? It was Francis. The firm was Francis. It was all Francis. If I offered a suggestion, he would receive it with that easy acquiescence of indifference with which one quiets a troublesome child, hearing what I had to say, and then acting as he had previously made up his mind to do; and at each new instance of his over-riding my opinions, he would attempt to conciliate me—still like a child—by fresh sacrifices on his part to promote my comfort. The hate, sweet as the juice of the forbidden fruit, at first, from being shut up in my breast, fermented into the clear wine of the fire of wrath, and intoxicated and maddened me till I was drunk with it—drunk with hate. Was I indeed mad? I know not. The reader of this confession—which will be found upon me when I am no more—shall judge.

The first guess I had in my brain of what my heart intended against Francis came from finding one thought continually bubbling up, as it were, from the cauldron of my mind. Day and night, at office and at home, it was always there—always alike. What to do with a body? Not his body. But supposing anyone else to have done such a thing as to commit a murder. what should I do with the body if I were in his place? Hide it, for certain. We all do that. But where? And that led to how a something else was to be done, of which I as yet dared not think, and to a when, which I trembled to confront. One day, I knew what I would do with a body, supposing I was anyone else who had done such a thing, so as to require to know.

The next question that arose from the seething passion within me was how to account for a person being missed? I was pausing, pen in hand, trying to think out the question impersonally, yet knowning my heart meant Francis all the while, and nervously thumbing the shipping papers on my desk. Francis, on the other side, was intently engaged in ticking off some sales I had prepared for the Mauritius mail with his peculiar "tick" in red ink; it was a tick something like the letter V with a cross stroke through the center. With my eyes fixed on my brother, I was still trying to solve the question. What could I do? How could I account for somebody being missed, lest—

"Do not trouble yourself, William; I will account for it," said my brother, without looking up.

"Account for it—for what?" I cried.

"What? Oh, the third bill of lading of Chanvin Brothers' consignment. That's what you missed, I expect. I took it off your desk this morning, and posted it."

"Did I speak aloud, Francis?" I asked, for I feared I had betrayed my thoughts.

"No, William; I did not hear you speak at all."

"Were you thinking of the bill of lading when you said that you would account for it?"

"No, lad, I don't remember that I was, or that I was thinking of anything at all at the moment, excepting the accounts I am looking over. But I supposed I fancied you had missed something, I spoke without thought, in fact—when, the bill of lading coming into my head the next moment, I supposed it was that. Why, William, my poor fellow, how pale you are. You are tired; you work too late. Leave me to finish up the day's papers, while you take a turn for half an hour, till I am ready."

"I am tired, Francis," I said, "let us both go home now."

He put away his papers, and we walked home to our lodgings in Kingland together. As we walked, there came an awful lull of quiet over the tempest of my heart.

We worked at the office later and later together each day, until we accustomed ourselves to snatch our hasty meals behind the wooden screen that parted off that portion of our dreary room intended for a clerk's office. Here, in the intervals of writing, we would now and then sit and talk of business together. Often at such times, when I have felt my brother's yoke growing more and more irksome, I have proposed to him that we should separate. I did so on the night before that day. "No, William," he replied, "a partnership between brothers is not lightly broken. I can never part from you, nor you from me. Nothing shall separate us, brother."

"No," I repeated dreamily for my thoughts were wandering away in a strange direction, "nothing shall ever separate us, brother."

I am not likely to forget that day. It was the 23d of November, 1840. A dreary Friday, when a steaming mist was going up from the pavements, and a dense yellow fog was coming down from clouds no higher than our office windows. The fog, oppressive and chocking, was densest in narrow alleys like those of Great St. Helen's where it seemed to have wedged itself in and got thick, so that the sound of the bell of old St. Hellen's Church, which came down upon me like a falling bolt from the sky, appeared to meet with a dull resistance from it.

The fog was nothing to me. A denser mist than ever oppressed the city was rising lurid hot from the molten passions within me. A fearful red mist, that came up from my soul like the vapor of an oven. Invisible gossamers of the pit were spinning round me soft grey webs, that shut me in with the mist and with them. Ghastly phantasms projected themselves upon the mist, like pictures in the wizard's glass; and in them I saw the future of the day, vague and distorted, but I knew what must come—knew it as well as I know it now. And when, from my desk, I saw Francis dimly through this dreadful medium, all the treatment I had ever received from him became magnified into one crime of blackest dye, at sight of which my heart bounded within me like the leap of a fiend. I knew that the gossamers of the pit were weaving the web thicker and faster now, until it shut out the office, and my desk, and my brother Francis from my sight, and shut me in close in the mist in the infernal web, there was nothing—nothing but the purpose.

Mechanically I sat writing. When he got up I knew what he would do and what would come next; I knew he was going to send Banks, the porter, to dinner, and that he would then go and sit by the fire for a few minutes' rest from writing, and business thought.

Francis took a chair at the hearth, and began to pore some memoranda, with his back to me. I followed, and stood behind him, crushing the falling embers in the grate with the poker. I cannot tell if the demons of the web caught the weapon out of my grasp, or whether they used my hands for the purpose, and lifted them for the blow. I saw him suddenly struck a fearful blow, as he fell heavily from his chair to the floor without a groan. I struck and struck again—horrid, cruel blows—until my vengeance was appeased and my arm weary—until the wine of hate turned to vinegar of gall—until the vail of the web shrivelled up into one red spot, which burnt itself into my forehead, and I knew I was forever branded with the mark of Cain—until the mist rolled away from before my eyes, could I see—my brother. Then first I looked and beheld my work.

I had hated him before, I feared him now. Flesh and blood; but so much blood—ah me, so much blood! What was to be done? A murderer here with his work, in the midst of business in the city! Quick!—for as I looked down on him I thought how sweet life was. Banks was at dinner; I expected no one in; but they might come at any minute; and what could I say?

Did the fiends tell me, or how did I know that the hearthstone would lift up, and that beneath it there was—no, not a grave—a hole ready? I never knew this till now? no!—oh that some one would tell me no!

But he must be moved. I covered the marred, beaten face, and hid my eyes whilst I dragged him a few feet away, so as to lift the stone. How long it seemed before he was covered in, and the stone down again. I wet with the dank dews of horror, and colder than he was. O me, how long!

There was the blood, too. And I had heard the stain of blood would never come out. It is a lie; it will come out of everything but the soul of man. I got water from the office tap, and towels, and washed the boards on my hands and knees, as well as I could; sprinkled fresh sand on the floor and laid down our piece of matting before the fire; cleaned the poker, by heating it red-hot, and my hands and clothes with water. I had hardly finished when I saw Banks the porter pass the window, and take his station at the door.

It so happened that not a single person entered the office during the remainder of the afternoon. I could not have answered them on business matters if they had. How I stayed there during those three hours I cannot tell, except that for that time I dared not go out. And how, at last, raking out the fire beneath which it lay, and seizing my letters, I at length locked up the office and came out into the passage, I cannot tell, except that I dared not remain.

What should I say when Francis was missed? How could I account for going home without him? I could not tell. But I dreaded to pass the porter at the door, lest he should ask me for my brother. I managed to say as I went by, without looking at him—

"Going to post, Banks—back presently."

"Very good, sir; I suppose Master Francis will be in if any one calls?"

Not daring to reply, I walked to St. Martin's-le-Grand wondering all the way why people, seeing the mark on m forehead, did not seize me as my brother's murderer. I might have been away three-quarters of an hour before I returned to the office. There was Banks still lounging at the door, stolid as ever—he could have suspected nothing, then.

"Master Francis has gone out, sir, and locked up."

"Gone out, Banks?" I repeated in awful amazement.

"Yes sir—went out about ten minutes after you did. Think he was going home. He never said anything or wished me good night, but walked straight out of the passage. He looked pale, sir, and troubled, but he has looked like that lately. He never turned his head nor spoke after he left the door."

I felt a cold and icy thrill of horror pass over me. What had Banks seen?

That instant Mr. Goldimer came up to the door, out of breath. Mr. Goldimer was a gentleman with whom we had long held business intercourse.

"Just the very man I want," he said—"glad I've caught you before I go home. I wish to see you about some serons of indigo I have for sale. I met your brother at Bishopsgate street a quarter of an hour since, and turned back to overtake him after he had passed me, but he walked so fast I could not come up with him. I followed him right down to the Mansion House, and there lost him in the crowd, behind a stream of traffic that blocked the crossing, and prevented my seeing which way he turned. But I see you have done for to-night, so, as I am going your way, I'll walk with you."

He took my arm. What I said about the indigo I have no idea. I could not have answered coherently. My thoughts were freezing with awe. What could it all mean? what was this which Banks had just seen—which Mr. Goldimer had just seen? It was not him, or they would have seen his ghastly, wounded face, and know me for his slayer. Could it be his spirit, willing even now to spare me from evil, regardless of himself as in life, by distracting suspicion from me? Was it thus he would fullfil his answer to the problem I had never solved, when he had said "he would account for it?" My knees quaked beneath me, and my limbs trembled like quivering leaves. In an agony I cried out in the street—

"My brother Francis—oh, my brother—my brother Francis!" and clasped my forehead with my hands, as if I might so press back the thoughts of my brain.

This brought me round. I knew what I had said in an instant—knew that I had betrayed myself. Fool that I was! what could save me now?

"You are ill," Mr. Goldimer said. "You must come in and take something, or you will faint. We are close to my house." He took me in and gave me brandy. I drank it like water, till I felt stronger.

"Do you know what you said in the street, Mr. Marston?"

"Oh, fool, not to have bit my tongue through, rather than have cried aloud.

"Because," continued my friend, without waiting a reply, "I am pained and grieved by it—deeply grieved."

"Why?" I asked, quickly.

"This fainting fit and that cry of yours mean something—something I fear that portends you evil."

"And what do they mean?" I cried, starting up; my cheeks tingling like ice, as I expected to be confronted with my crime. "Tell me what they mean, and what you know, instantly; and why you have tracked me home, and brought me here? You said you had seen him," I stammered out to Mr. Goldimer. I could not go on; my tongue was parched.

"Be calm, and I will try to tell you, if you insist, though I should not," he replied. "I would rather you would consider the words unsaid, and forget them. There may be, after all, some mistake. Let me tell you to-morrow."

"To-night," I said, calmer now; "let me hear what you mean that portends me evil—now, at once. I insist."

"It was wrong of me, and inconsiderate, and I fear I shall give you pain, but as I have gone so far, and you insist on knowing the rest, I must beg your forgiveness for my thoughtlessness. You wish to know why I feel grieved by your exclamation and emotion in the street?"

"Yes."

"Because it is the same cry I made when I was a lad, at home, without any exciting cause, during my brothers absence at a shooting party. An hour afterwards he was brought home dead—accidentally shot by his own gun, while getting through a hedge. I will tell you no more. Forgive my repeating this, even at your request."

I was better now—much better.

"Mr. Goldimer," "I said, "I thank you for the kindness to me during my fainting fit. As to what you have told me, it was my own fault for insisting on hearing it. I shall not be nervous again. I will go to my brother at once, for he will doubtless be returned to Kingsland."

We walked thither together.

Having parted from Mr. Goldimer, I shut myself in our room, and went to my desk. Trusting, for its efficacy, to a remarkable similarity between the handwriting of Francis and myself, I wrote the following letter, sealed it, and buttoned it in my coat pocket.

29A, Gt. St. Helen's, London,
22d November, 1840.

Mr. William Marston—Dear Brother: Disappointed in business anticipations, with a broken spirit, I give up the race to you, whilst I seek rest in the river, whence the weary and the wretched of our city have sought it before. Trouble not to seek the body of your brother, now at peace. Your affectionate brother,

FRANCIS MARSTON, Marston Bros.

To Mr. William Marston.

It was trying work, talking to our landlady of the strangeness of my brother's absence, and listening to all her trivial surmises as to the cause, until the house was locked up. But I did it till bed-time. I never slept nor undressed. Hard as it was to be alone with my secret, I dreaded worse to meet it in sleep.

PART THE SECOND.

All that night long I paced the room, crying, because I dared not pray for the black darkness that had fallen on us to take itself from off the earth and from off my heart.

In the morning I called for Mr. Goldimer, and walked to the city with him. He was kind and sympathising, trusted my brother's absence would be satisfactorily accounted for when I arrived at the office, and made me promise to set his mind at rest by informing him of the first news I received of Francis.

Leaving him at his office in Crutched Friars, I proceeded to Great St. Helen's, where I found Banks at his post on the door step.

"Banks," I said "have you seen Mr. Francis this morning?"

"No, Master William."

"He never came home to Kingsland last night, Banks. Are you sure he did not say where he was going when he left the office?"

"Never said a word, sir; he walked straight ont past me without speaking, and never answered when I said, 'Good night, Master Francis.'"

"And you are sure you saw him go out?"

"Positive, Master William; and I shall never forget how pale and anxious-like he looked, not to my dying day."

I opened the office that now held my terrible secret, and having quickly placed my letter on the desk, called to Banks to come in and lay the fire and dust the books. While he was doing this, I went up to the desk, as if by accident, and caught up the letter.

"Why, Banks," I said, "what does this mean? Here is a letter on my desk from Mr. Francis." As I read my own writing, I buried my face in my hands, not from hypocrisy, but terrified at the success which promised to attend this diabolical plot.

"Mr. Francis will never come back any more, Banks," I said. "Go and fetch Mr. Goldimer."

When Mr. Goldimer came I passed the letter over to him. If it was fear and cowardice that caused me to remain with my head still bowed down on my arms, which lay extended on the desk while he read, it was at least genuine emotion. It was not my fault if my friend attributed it to the outburst of passionate grief.

I will not dwell on how much Mr. Goldimer was moved by the remarkable similiarity between the warning he supposed me to have received of the death of Francis, and that which had occurred in his own experience in connection with his brother—nor need I refer to the terms in which he placed his sympathy and services at my disposal. He did his best, I am sure, to comfort me under my affliction. I know that every phrase of consolation he uttered made the wound in my soul smart and sting afresh. At all events, Mr. Goldimer saved me the pang of communicating the nature of the unfortunate occurrence to the world. Not a particle of suspicion at any time attached itself to me. On my own testimony I had left Francis in the office at half-past four o'clock on that dreadful day. Banks had seen him go out ten minutes afterward. Mr. Goldimer had met, recognized him, and followed him through the streets after that. The letter in my writing was always accepted as genuine, for it was impossible to tell the difference at any time between Francis' writing and mine. There was indeed no reason to dispute it, for two persons testified to having seen my brother subsequent to the latest time at which it was possible I could have been with him, which, thanks to Mr. Goldimer, I had never been alone from the time of my last seeing Francis to the time I had discovered, or pretended to have discovered the letter. It was a relief to me to be able to give way to my feelings so freely when I found that the agonies of remorse I suffered were always attributed to the mourning of a bereaved heart. Receiving nothing but expressions of the most sincere condolence from all my friends and business connections, I soon began to feel more at ease in my intercourse with them.

The efforts of Mr. Goldimer to discover my brother's body were unremitting. Daily he went to inspect bodies recovered from the Thames—as often returning to offer me renewed expressions of sympathy as he was unable to recognize one of them as that of my late partner. Of the bodies, some were brought to shore in a state utterly defying identification, and further than to surmise that my brother's remains might be among these, Mr. Goldimer could not afford me the consolation he thought I sought.

I had used the first interval I had to myself to cement down with my own hands the hearthstone of the grate. Free from suspicion, and now left alone with the sole responsibility of all I had worked for—sinned for—within my reach, business became a balm to me. It was something for my thoughts to grasp at and to hold to, lest they should wander elsewhere, and desperately I sought to kill and distract them with the cares and anxieties of an exciting occupation. But the office had now become a place of torment to me. Alone there with my secret I should have gone mad. I therefore engaged a clerk to keep me company—Thomas Wix, a quiet, respectful servant of middle age, and a very correct accountant, reccommended to me by Mr. Goldimer. I had a desk fitted up for him in the empty clerk's office behind the screen, for I dared not fill my brother's vacant desk nor move his stool. I explained this to Mr. Wix as aiding a fancy of mine to help me to think of the firm always as Marston Brothers.

I now plunged widly into the most hazardous of schemes. The more speculative and uncertain the better. No bubble company newly started on the most insecure basis was too wild for me. I cared not. It was not money I was seeking, but excitement to kill the stings within. I incurred liabilities amounting to twenty times—fifty times—the total assets at my command, in a single morning's transactions. I never cared what amount I staked. I became reckless and desperate, and gambled in railway stocks and shares, and foreign loans, that every prudent speculator would say it was ruinous to touch. I only sough the whirl of giddy business care to preoccupy my mind. I would sit at my desk looking over the list of stocks and shares, and, wherever my fancy led me, I would make selections from the most dangerous and fluctuating. My mind was soon filled with so many wild speculations, that I frequently did things absently, which I forgot immediately afterwards. I skimmed my lists so hurriedly, pen in hand, that by the time I got on 'Change, I seldom even remembered which were the schemes I had marked for investment, or how I had marked them. I never varied from buying or selling according to the marks, though it at times occurred to me to doubt if they were not altered in some way, and it excited a passing wonder in my mind as to how I had come unconsciously to imitate my brother's "tick."

It was first at these times, while going through my lists, that I became conscious of a vague, mysterious vapor that would float toward my brother's desk, and faintly dim the wall behind and the files of papers which hung there. I knew not then what it might mean, and dared not think, but immersed myself the deeper in business for relief from the dread of evil to come.

On 'Change I was always known as Marston Brothers. So the name stood in which all the scrips and stock I became liable for were bought. Strange to say, as my speculations turned in, one after another, they proved tremendous successes. I had bought at the most favorable time, and sold out at precisely the right moment, netting large sums in premiums from those who purchased my liabilities at extravagant rates, many of whom were ruined by holding out till the crisis came. In these early days of railway speculation, money rarely changed hands, except in the way of premiums and discounts. By buying a thousand shares, was simply understood becoming liable for that amount. Scrip for enormous sums was bought and sold, of which not the smallest figure in the pence columns was ever represented by paid-up capital. If I had failed, the whole of my assets would only have been sufficient to meet a trifling fraction of my engagements. As it was, the success of Marston Brothers was the favorite theme of discussion everywhere, and money poured in on me from every side.

The first use I made of my wealth was to purchase the house in Geat St. Helen's, and to have the upper portion fitted up as a dwelling house. I never cared when folks said it was a strange fancy for a wealthy man of business to choose to live in one of the closest alleys of the city. That was my affair. People never go to tortures from choice, but because there is nowhere else for them to go. My place of torment was the only spot in which I could live; that I might be near it, and watch that no one came to seek it. This was part of my punishment, to be bound for ever to the dead body of my victim; a punishment not invented by Mezentius, but by Cain.

My office was now handsomely fitted up, and filled with busy clerks. It had been enlarged and altered, but that part containing the fire-place and the desk at which he and I had sat together, was parted off into a private room, otherwise unchanged, except by the addition of furniture and carpet. Could I help it if people chose to think that my anxiety to preserve an old-fashioned grate and worm-eaten desk was because my gentle heart could not consent to part with a single momento of my brother, and our hard struggles together in by gone years.

Sitting at my place at my desk after the alterations had been completed, I observed with undefined awe that the vapor on my brother's side began to grow every day more condensed and gradually to contract itself within closer compass. Before-time it was not always there. Now I was aware that it never left the side at which Francis had sat. I knew it was there, whether I looked or not; I felt it.

I was one day engaged in looking through some prices current, marking here and there with pencil what I would buy for the South American market. I had laid them down on the desk while thinking; when I took them up to resume my occupation, I saw that two of the lines had been marked with a "tick" in red ink, like the letter V with a cross stroke down the center. A fearful sensation of creeping horror came over me, making the hairs of my flesh stand up as I remembered I had used a pencil, and not ink of any kind. I recollected with awe that the share lists I had taken on 'Change had been marked in precisely the same manner. Now I knew the marks were none of mine. They were His! Lifting my eyes I saw the vapor at the other desk had become dense and assumed a clear defined outline; it was He! and I knew from that moment the shade of my brother Francis should never leave the desk. This is why it has been Marston Brothers so long —is Marston Brothers now—and will be Marston Brothers till the end. Daily that fearful shade grew plainer and clearer to my sight, until it assumed the actual form of Francis himself in dreadful reality. Not ghastly or marred in its awful face, as his poor face had been. It is the face Mr. Goldmer and Banks had described—pale, pre-occupied and self-involved. It never moved nor changed. Its eyes are always fixed on me, and yet never seems to see me; they are looking through me, at something still in my future that is to come. No one else sees the shade. Mr. Wix has gone to that side of the desk and handed me papers through it, often, without knowing; and when I have called to him in horror not to approach his stool, Mr. Wix has seen nothing but the stool, and retired with a respectful smile of sympathy. It is part of my fearful secret that I alone am permitted to see the shade, and that it has made known to me in a way I am unable to describe that there will be a change in It before the End shall come, and that the End is near. Near! Oh! how long? when my heart has been in the lake of fire for ever and ever already?—and it is but five and twenty years.

From the night of my sinful deed, which has taken a body to confront me ever since, I have had no single misfortune in business. Whatever I have touched has turned to gold; but the blood of which I have drunk deeper than the son of Cybele, brings visions of more dire import to torment my brain than those which his red draught dissolved. The red ink mark, like the letter V, has been upon all my papers —it has never erred, no matter how wild the scheme to which it is attached. I make money, whether I will or no —against my will—for I am bound to follow that red ink "tick" by a power I cannot withstand. My ships are never lost; my merchandise never meets a bad market; my foreign agents never fail. I have made money until I am weary of it, sick of it, and lavished it like dirt upon every charity within my notice, if, peradventure, I might purchase peace—a boon which gold can never buy, or I would have paid its price in hundreds of thousands long ago, and been free.

There is nothing but peace, rest, and forgiveness in all the wide world that I would buy, and they are not to be had.

I thought in twenty-five years I had trained the cup of wormwood and gall—which I myself mingled with my brother's blood—to the dregs, but I was mistaken. In turning over my papers to-night, I came upon my brother's letter. His letter, I say—for it is his, not mine. Else why, for the first time, should that fearful shade cease to gaze into the future, and gradually rest its eyes on the paper in my hand, and burn through that letter into my heart as if the future for which it had been looking so long had come—as if the eyes would tell me that the future for which it had waited for five and twenty years that very night was come and that beyond it there was nothing for me but darkness?

I twisted the hated letter up—I threw it in the gas—and threw it down, all burning, on the floor, and there trampled out the flame as bitterly as I trampled the life out of my brother Francis.

The eyes of the shade left me for a moment, and fastening on the ashes of the paper on the floor, compelled me again to take it in my hand by that power which I could not resist. And then, as I saw the crumpled paper was not all burnt, and watched its smouldered ashes, I knew that the shade was a warning, and resolving itself at last into floating vapors, which, enveloping me in a cold cloud, spent itself in icy mist above and around me, and baptised me into death by its awful chill dews. It faded, all but the eyes, and these have lodged themselves as burning coals of fire within me to scorch my soul. I saw the words of the letter which remained on the charred paper in my hand. The words burnt from the paper with awful distinctness:

22d November, 1840.

Mr. William Marston

Dr. To the River.

For the body of ——— ———

MARSTON BROS.

True, oh, dreadful shade. The river was searched for the body, and charged by me with its possession. The river but claims its due. The bill is just. It is owed. I cannot dispute it, for it was drawn by my own hand. This night I perish by that death which I gave out to have been my brother's. Not Francis, but William Marston will perish in yonder dismal tide, wherein the weary and the wretched of our city have perished before.

THE FIGHT BETWEEN THE "MONITOR" AND THE "MERRIMAC."*

EARLY in March, 1862, Capt. John Lorimer Worden was placed in command of Ericsson's Monitor, and ordered to proceed to Hampton Roads. He arrived there on the evening of the eighth, and immediately went out to the protection of the Minnesota, lying hard aground just below Newport News.

Worden found a terrible state of things on his arrival. The iron-clad Merrimac had come out that very day, and sent two of our vessels to the bottom. The most intense excitement prevailed, and all wondered what the morning would bring forth. Lieutenant Morris, in temporary command of the Cumberland, had fought his ship bravely, but his terrific broadsides had no effect on the monster, and she kept on her way shaking the heavy shot like peas from her mailed sides, and struck the frigate with a force that careened her far over, and stove a hole in her side as big as a hogshead. Delivering a broadside as she backed off, she came on again, striking her amidships. She then lay off and deliberately hurled the shells from her 100-pound Armstrong guns into the sinking ship. These monstrous missiles of death tore through the wooden sides of the Cumberland with a destructive power that was awful to witness. Guns went spinning over the deck—great masses of splintered timbers flew about like straws in a gale, while dismembered, mangled bodies lay strewed over the gory deck. But Morris, aided by Lieutenants Davenport, Selfridge, and other subordinate officers, disdained to surrender, and poured in the heavy broadsides with a rapidity and power that would have sent any wooden vessel that ever floated to the bottom. But they made no impression apparently on this mailed monster. To the report that the ship was sinking, these noble officers replied only with fiercer broadsides. They determined that the flag above them should never be struck, and like Paul Jones, when told that his vessel was on fire and sinking, replied: "If we can do no better, we will sink alongside," they too resolved to fight on, while a gun could be fired, and then go down with their colors proudly flying. At length the waters rushed through the port holes, as the noble frigate slowly settled over them. Still no man faltered, and the pivot-guns on deck gave a last shot as with a sudden lurch the vessel went to the bottom, carrying her dead and wounded with her.

Some attempted to escape by swimming, and many were picked up by a propeller, but nearly a hundred of the gallant crew went to the bottom with her, and among them the Chaplain.

The work of destruction had been completed in forty-five minutes, and then the Merrimac turned to the Congress, which, seeing the fate of the Cumberland, hoisted sail and endeavored to escape, but got hopelessly aground. The Merrimac now steamed to within about a hundred yards, and then lay to and deliberately raked the frigate from stern to stern with her enormous shells. The carnage was awful. The rebel steamers Jamestown and Yorktown also came up and poured in their fire, and soon the decks of the Congress presented a ghastly spectacle. Added to all, she was set on fire in three places, and the flames, fanned by a brisk wind, soon roared along her decks. Out of feelings of humanity to the wounded, who would be roasted alive in the burning ship, the colors were hauled down. But while a boat was coming to take off the prisoners, some sharpshooters on shore kept up their fire, which so incensed the commander of the Merrimac, that he ordered another broadside to be poured into the surrendered vessel, which caused great slaughter.

Leaving the Congress to consume away until her magazine was reached, the Merrimac now turned to the Minnesota and Lawrence, both of which had unaccountably got aground. That all these vessels should get aground, and thus become helpless targets for the enemy, is certainly very strange.

As the Merrimac approached the Minnesota, she received one of the broadsides of the latter, and fired in turn, but she could not get within a mile, and fearing to get aground in the dark she retired to her anchorage, behind Craney Island, to wait till morning before completing her work of destruction.

This was the state of things at the time of Worden's arrival. The Monitor was a small vessel, mounting only two guns in her revolving turret, and wholly untried in combat. Those who hailed her arrival as a saviour, were confounded at her insignificant appearance. It required a great deal of faith to believe she could cope with a vessel that had just destroyed two frigates.

It was a sad Saturday night—Fortress Monroe was thronged with fugitives—the heavens were aflame with the burning Congress, which at last expolded with the sound of thunder—the Merrimac was apparently uninjured, and, "What will the Sabbath morning bring?" was the mournful question that trembled on every lip.

Worden lay all night alongside of the Minnesota, in case a nocturnal attack should be attempted.

The morning broke bright and beautiful—not a cloud obscured the sky, and every glass was turned in the direction from which the Merrimac was expected to come. Soon she was seen approaching, accompanied by her consorts of the day before. The Minnesota at once beat to quarters. Worden ordered the iron hatches to be closed, the dead light covers put on, and the little Monitor put in perfect fighting trim, while he and some of his officers stood on the top of the turret and watched the movements of the approaching vessels. These were followed by steamers filled with gentlemen and ladies from Norfolk, who were coming out to see the crowning victory. As the Merrimac approached the Minnesota, Worden steamed out and ran boldly down to meet her. The enemy seemed non-plussed at the bold approach of what seemed scarcely big enough to be a New York ferryboat. It looked more like a raft with a round tub upon it nine feet high, and twenty feet in diameter. The commander of the Minnesota watched her progress with the deepest anxiety, for on the success of this new, untried experiment rested the salvation of his ship. To his astonishment, he saw Worden lay her right alongside of the Merrimac, where she looked like a fly beside an ox. But small as she was, her guns threw shot weighing a hundred and seventy pounds, and the first that struck the Merrimac woke her commander up to a sense of the danger that menaced him, and he opened a whole broadside on the tiny structure; heavy enough, one would think, to blow her out of the water. But the turret was the only thing to fire at, and most of the shot flew harmlessly over her, while those that did strike the turret, glanced off. It was a marvelous spectacle—that little thing holding at bay and worrying such a monster.

The Merrimac, finding that she could do nothing with her pertinacious little adversary, turned her attention once more to the Minnesota, and steaming towards her, received a broadside from the latter, which, as Van Brunt, her commander, said, "would have blown out of the water any timber-built ship in the world." The heavy shot, however, rattled harmlessly against the sides of the Merrimac, when she, in turn, sent a rifled shell into the Minnesota, which tore through the chief engineer's state-room, the engineers' mess-room, amidships, and bursting in the boatswain's room, knocked four rooms into one in its headlong passage, and set the vessel on fire. A second exploded the boiler of the tug Dragon alongside, causing for a while, great alarm. But all this time, Worden in his "cheese-tub," as the rebels called her, was crowding all steam to overtake his powerful adversary, and by the time the latter had fired his third shell was again between the two vessels, covering with amazing audacity the Minnesota. Exasperated at her inability either to shake off her puny antagonist or cripple her, the Merrimac now determined to run into and over her, and sink her by mere weight—and turning, ran full speed upon her. She struck the little Monitor with tremendous force, and her bow passed over the deck, But at that close range Worden planted one of his heavy shot square on the iron roof, with such resistless force that it went clean through. The monster backed off with a shudder, and then, enraged at the invulnerability of her antagonist, concentrated her entire fire on the turret. Worden was stationed at the pilot-house, while Green managed the guns, and Stimers turned the turret. The two vessels at times almost touched, and the explosion of their monster guns at this short range was most terrific. Titanic hammers seemed incessantly falling on their iron armor—so fierce and fast flew the shot. One shot struck the turret with such force that it knocked down Lieutenant Stimers and two men. Another struck the pilot-house, breaking in two an iron log a foot thick. It hit just outside of where Worden had his eye, knocking him senseless, while the small particles of iron driven off by the concussion, flew into his eyes, completely blinding him for the time being. But it was soon evident that the Merrimac was getting the worst of it. Worden had found his way into her vitals, and would soon send her to the bottom, and so she wheeled out of the conflict and under the convoy of two tugs, limped away to her moorings. The Monitor followed her a short distance, but Worden having received orders to act strictly on the defensive, and not leave the fleet, he soon ceased to follow his thoroughly humbled antagonist.

Lieutenant Wise, who had watched the conflict from the shore, now jumped into a boat and rowed off to the Monitor. As he descended through the "man hole" to the cabin below, everything was as calm and quiet as though nothing had happened. One officer stood by the mirror, leisurely combing his hair, another was washing some blood from his hands while the gallant commander lay on a settee with his eyes bandaged, but giving no sign of the excrutiating pain that raked him. The first words he uttered on recovering from the stunning effect of the shot was:

"Have I saved the Minnesota?"

"Yes," was the reply, "and whipped the Merrimac."

"Then," said he, "I don't care what becomes of me."

He had saved more than the Minnesota—how much that more was, one shudders to contemplate. It is a wonder—when we remember how the iron-clads afterwards suffered before Charleston—that the turret did not get jammed so that it would not revolve; or one, at least, of the two cannon, did not have its muzzle broken off under the close and awful cannonade to which she was exposed.

Some will call it a wonderful piece of luck, while the devout man will see in it a remarkable interference of Providence in our behalf. Never was a government so warned as ours had been of this very catastrophe, and never did one show such apathy under it.

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

THE BATTLE OF THE PIANOS.

THERE seems to have been a vast deal of excitement, and not a little even of bad feeling, among the rival piano-manufacturers, in the contest for the gold medal at the Paris Exposition. The correspondent of the New York Weekly Review, a paper specially devoted to musical matters, gives the following interesting account of some curious features of the battle :

"The great battle is apparently decided, and the different jurors have either left town already or are going to leave in a day or two. The English noblemen, who fought justly and bravely for their countrymen in the musical department, have been successful, and it seems to be the rare case that everybody is satisfied. The decision, of course, is a public secret and may have reached you before my letters comes to hand, but you probably do not know yet by what ways and means the decision was brought about. Some German papers say that the piano makers fought their battle with batteries of champagne masked by forests of asparagus. This, however, was not the case, as it is certain that no member of the Jury was directly or indirectly accessible by bribery, with the exception, perhaps, of one well-known character, or rather man without character, whose old age prevents me from giving his name. The battle was solely and simply fought on the merits of the pianos and the inventions ; not without intrignes, and sometimes false assertions, but generally in a fair and open manner. I informed you, some time ago, that the American pianos were so superior to all exhibited by European makers that the only question was, which of the firms of Messrs. Steinway, and Chickering should be awarded the gold medal."

The correspondent then, after stating the award of the gold medal to the Steinway Piano by the Jury, makes the following singular statement :

"The Emperor, however, had expressed the wish to the Commissioners General to have a gold medal awarded to at least one English exhibitor in every class, and, of course, such a wish was not to be disregarded. In consequence of this, and of the decided superiority of the Broadwood pianos over the other English instruments, the medal for England was awarded to Mr. Broadwood, who, an accomplished gentleman and a prominent piano manufacturer, does not seem to like the manner in which the compliment, however flattering, has been paid him. The matter of the gold medals seemed to be thus settled ; when all at once one member of the Jury asked for a gold medal for a German piano firm, whose pianos are made in imitation of the Steinway system. This motion met with a most decided resistance on the part of the adherents of the old system among the Jurors, and it was not improperly remarked that, if an imitator of the Steinway system, who certainly did not attain its perfection, received a gold medal, then Messrs. Steinway ought to receive a prize superior to any provided by the Imperial Commission, and that this evidently could not be done. It would, so they argued, be more proper to give a third medal to the best pianos manufactured after the old system ; and since the pianos of Messrs. Chickering were the best of this kind, a third gold medal was asked for their pianos. After a great many meetings and the most spirited contest, in which the Chickering pianos were sometimes rather roughly handled, America came out again victorious. A third gold medal was decided upon for the Chickering pianos.

A CRITICAL ROASTING.

The appearance of Mr. Tupper's "Third Series of Proverbial Philosophy," has proved the signal for an unmerciful critical attack by most of the higher order of English literary journals. The author seems to have anticipated something of the kind, and consequently he determined to get the start of his persecutors by expressing his scorn and defiance of the whole critical, or as he would probably say, hypercritical tribe, in advance, which he has done in a number of unusually ferocious verses—that is, unusually ferocious in so mild a writer as Mr. Tupper. Afterwards, in an almost plaintive strain, he consoles himself for the expected roasting at the hands of supercilious and arrogant literary authorities, by such reflections as these :

"Wordsworth, simple and sublime, how long they laughed at thee !
Coleridge, the gentle and profound, which of them did honor to thine eloquence ?
Byron, answering scorn with scorn, well didst thou turn and rend them—
And even Shakspeare, Newton, Pope, were scouted and defamed !"

Whereupon one of his remorseless tormentors thus comments in the Saturday Review :

"Shakspeare, Newton, Pope, Wadsworth, Coleridge, Byron and Tupper. Was climax ever sublimer ? What can be finer than the thought of Mr. Tupper exclaiming philosophically, "Shakspeare, Newton, and I have all been ill treated by the critics," or, as he would probably put it, Ego et rex meus, "I and Shakspeare and Newton?" Posterity, however, repairs the injustice of contemporaries, and our descendants will meditate with equal enthusiasm on "Hamlet," the "Principia," and the "Proverbial Philosophy."

Alluding, we presume, to the long interval that has elapsed since the appearance of his "Second Series," (we had no idea that it was so long,) Mr. Tupper says :

"Once more then after thirty years, I come, O friend and brother,
Bringing my modern thoughts to thee in their antique disguise :
This Eastern garb is somewhat, if its ancient quaintness help
To catch thy kind attention, and to win thy willing mind."

He also declares in another verse :

"Again I have written at my best, according to the mercies given me."

Which furnishes the text for another inhuman critical commentary, as follows :

"Again I have written at my best," Mr. Tupper says in an exquisitely musical verse after his own delicious manner, "according to the mercies given me." In the case of some writers this would be a pleasant thing to know. But there is such an absurdly trifling difference between Mr. Tupper at his best and Mr. Tupper at his worst, that one is at a loss to know when he is writing in one style and when in the other. Yet the frank or plaintive confession that he has no better wares to offer than these, that this represents the measure according to which mercies have been given to him, is rather touching, if one comes to think what it means. If pity rather than wrath is the sentiment proper to the contemplation of feebleness and helplessness, why should we be angry with a bad and vapid writer ? The poor gentleman owns that he has written at his best. He could do no more. We have no right to expect more. Let us then reflect with decorous compassion upon the mental state of the man to whom mercies assume the shape of an ever overflowing cup of Proverbial Philosophy. Let us think of the hours of meritorious effort which have been laboriously expended in the production of a result whose quality, alas, we all know and see but too well. Respectful sympathy would seem to be the just attitude in which to approach Mr. Tupper when writing at his best, according to his lights and his mercies. His Proverbial Philosophy has pretty nearly every bad quality that writing can possibly have. Yet he cannot help it. Now and again, when vapidity and pretentious silliness drive us too hard, we heartily wish that some punishment might overtake so tormenting an author. But this is unphilosophical. The worst punishment is already in operation. To be the reader of Proverbial Philosophy is a misfortune, but to be its composer is a catastrophe. We can scarcely conceive a much more grievous penalty than for a man to have to sit down and write page after page and volume after volume of such matter, as Mr. Tupper is forced by the hard fate of his mental capacity to do. In any modern Inferno Mr. Tupper would certainly have an entire circle to himself.

Upon the whole, we rejoice that the persecuted author has armed himself against the stings of his torturers, by reflecting upon what other good and great men have suffered at the hands of supercilious critics ; for we fear that he will need all his "philosophy," and all the consolations to be derived from such reflections, to enable him to endure with patience, the fiery ordeal through which he is passing.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

THE dramatic revival which has been for some time in progress at Maguire's Opera House continues unabated. I really believe that Mr. Adams has been of more benefit to this city as a dramatic revivalist, than has the great revival preacher, Mr. Earle, in a religious way. It is no slight benefit to a city to be converted from trashy spectacular pieces and absurd sensation plays to Shakspeare and good comedy. That the public appreciate the service rendered them by Edwin Adams, was fully evinced on Monday, when he took his first benefit, appearing as "Raphael," in The Marble Heart ; the house was crowded to suffocation. On Tuesday, Macbeth was performed with the same cast as on the first occasion. On Wednesday evening, the comedy of Wild Oats, which, with Mr. Adams as "Rover," has taken such a firm hold on the favor of the public, was played to an immense house. The play of The King of the Commons, in which Mr. Adams appears to great advantage as "King James," was performed on Thursday. Last night, Mr. J. A. Herne, who has become a great favorite with the public during his stay here in consequence of the talent he has displayed in his impersonation of nearly every part which has fallen to him and his clever acting in comedy and character parts, took his farewell benefit, Edwin Adams and the whole company volunteering their services. The Marble Heart was played, Mr Herne appearing as "Volage," a part in which he made quite a hit. The performance concluded with the farce of The Limerick Boy, which afforded Mr. Herne an opportunity of doing some capital acting as "Paddy Miles." This afternoon a matinee will be given, and Mr. Herne will appear in favorite characters. The performance this evening will consist of Dreams of Delusion and Black Eyed Susan.

On Monday and Tuesday, Edwin Adams will repeat his great impersonation of "Hamlet." On Wednesday he will produce his play of The Heretic. This piece was written originally for Edwin Forrest, and was purchased from him by Edwin Adams who has won many laurels by the finished manner in which he portrays the hero. There is no chance of the attendance at the Opera House falling off for the present, as many of our best citizens are now returning from the watering places.

At the Metropolitan Theater on Monday, Rural Felicity, in which Mrs. C. R. Saunders made her appearance, was performed and the burlesque of Aladdin or the Wonderful Scamp concluded the evening's entertainment. This bill was repeated on the following night. On Wednesday the operetta, The Village Rivals, the farce Who Speaks First, and the extravaganza Atalanta. On Thursday evening Weber's grand opera of Der Freischutz, was performed in English in excellent style, with Miss Emma Howson as "Linda," Henri Herberte as "Rodolphe," Frank Howson as "Casper," and Miss Clelia Howson as "Rose." The music was admirably sung, and the opera was very well put upon the stage, the incantation scene in particular, being very effectively managed. Last night, The Laughing Hyena, and Rural Felicity, were played.

The entertainments given by the new management of the Metropolitan Theater during the past two weeks have been extremely good, combining good music, fine singing and clever acting. This afternoon the extravaganza of Perseus and Andromeda will be played. The entertainment for this evening will consist of the beautiful Irish fairy drama of Kate Kearny, or the Fairy of the Lakes of Killarney, which will be presented with beautiful scenery and fine music. On Monday the grand spectacular piece entitled The Black Rook, the most beautiful that has ever been produced on the San Francisco stage, will be presented again with all the original scenery, effects, dresses, etc., and several new and attractive features. The Martinetti troupe have been engaged, and the cast will be the same as before. Everyone admired this wonderful spectacle when it was first produced here, and many will be glad to see it again. Of course all are aware that it is essentially identical with the famous Black Crook, which seems likely to run for a year or two at Niblo's, New York, The management have some extraordinary novelties in preparation, and if talent, tact and energy, will secure success, most certainly the Metropolitan Theatre will become a popular resort.

TOUCHSTONE.

ITALIAN OPERA.—Petrella's opera of Ione, carefully rehearsed, and put on the stage with unusual attention to details was the opening performance of the second season, at the Academy of Music, on Wednesday evening last, and was received with great favor by a large and fashionable audience. The music is novel and interesting in style, and was admirably rendered by the artists. Signorina Brambilla as "Ione," Mme. Stella Bonheur as the slave "Nidia," Signor Limberti, as the wealthy young Athenian "Glaucus," Signor Mancusi as the Egyptian "Arbaces," and Signor Milleri as the tavern-keeper, "Burbo," were each and all in excellent voice, and did their utmost to contribute to the general fine effect; the chorus and orchestra also showed careful and thorough training, and the whole performance was remarkably creditable. Ione was given last night, and will be repeated (as an extra performance) this evening.

On Monday, Gounod's grand opera of Faust will be performed. The opera of L'Africaine is in rehearsal, and will be produced in perfect style.

WOODWARD'S GARDENS.—The camel at these gardens is a source of never-failing amusement to the juveniles who are daily taken there for the purpose of improving their knowledge of art, botany, and natural history. No reward for good behavior can be more acceptable to a well conducted little boy or girl than a ride on the camel at Woodward's Gardens.

ANATOMICAL MUSEUM.—The numerous objects of interest to be seen at this institution are admired by all who visit it. Much instruction as well as amusement, may be gained in the course of an hour.

MRS. CUPPY lectures on "The Higher Law," at Mechanics' Institute Hall, on Sunday evening.

AN EXTENSIVE ESTABLISHMENT.—There was a time when we had to procure our hams from the East. They came packed up in pitch plaister, and very often acquired a flavor during their voyage which was anything but pleasant. The necessity for importing hams from the Eastern States has passed away, as all may convince themselves by paying a visit to the immense smoke and packing house of W. K. Dietrich, who can be found at stalls 54, 55 and 56, Washington Market. The smoke house and packing rooms are at the corner of Hyde and Sacramento streets, and here Mr. Dietrich keeps a large force of experienced packers and curers constantly employed. From twenty to thirty thousand pounds of pork are turned out of this establishment weekly. An immense number of hams are always undergoing the smoking process in the three large smoke vaults. California hams and bacon are rapidly acquiring a high reputation. Mr. Dietrich supplies the Pacific Mail Company's steamers for the round trip, and in all climates this species of provision is equally good. In addition to the smoking and curing department is one where lard is melted down and packed in tin cans for family use and the grocery trade. This splendid establishment will well repay a visit. There are no secrets connected with the curing of hams and tongues with which Mr. Dietrich is not acquainted, and there is no reason why hams fully equal to the far-famed Westphalia hams should not be produced in California.

GOOD SPIRITS.—Considerable taste has to be exercised by importers of liquors. A. J. Bryant & Co, importers of liquors, 510, Front street, exercise much skill in choosing their spirits. They are sole agents on the Pacific Coast, for Blackburne's celebrated B B B Bourbon whiskey.

EVELY MAN A FIRE COMPANY.—By means of Edward L. Levy's patent fire annihilator every man can do the work of a fire company. The rates of insurance will certainly be lessened as soon as there is—as there should be—one of these remarkable engines in every house. They are very cheap, and no one can afford to be without one. The office is 304 Montgomery street.

ASPHALTUM WORK.—Every one appreciates the Asphaltum Sidewalks, and "Bonnet's" name generally appears thereon. We look upon Bonnet as a public benefactor, and would have his name everywhere on the sidewalks, so that he who walks may always see it.

REMOVAL.—Theodore Kallenberg, the expert model maker and machinist, has removed from 416 Market street, to No. 10 Stevenson street, near First. Mr. Kallenberg has constructed the models for the machinery for the U. S. Branch Mint of this city for years past.

LUKIN—Formerly at J. D. Thompson's, and at Frank's, has established himself in business at 332 Montgomery street, and has one of the finest saloons in 'Frisco. Call and see him.

"FISH FOR THE HALL."

"NOW, then, which of you is going to get me a big fish? Don't all speak at once. Come, one of you must. Which is it to be? Joe'll go, I know; won't you, Joe? I must have one before to-morrow night for the Squire. You needn't look so black, all of you."

Jenny Cooper, the speaker, was the prettiest girl in Shippon, and certainly she looked uncommonly pretty now, as she stood with her face flushed and her bright hair ruffling in the breeze in the middle of a knot of admirers at the gangway which ended the principal street of the village. It was a slack time in Shippon. The herring-fishing was just over—such a fishing as there had not been for years. The fishermen spoke of one shoal of herrings twenty miles long and ten broad, and so thick that their nets were torn with the weight of fish. Many of the boats had had to run into Harmouth deep loaded after a single haul.

The only boat which had not done well was one belonging to old Tim West, Jenny's grandfather, and the Squire, which had been put in charge of young Joe Crask. She had run aground the night before the great haul, and had had to put in for repairs, which cost a good deal of money. The consequence was that poor Joe, instead of having to receive a hundred pounds or so for his share of the fishing, found himself actually out of pocket, and worse off than all his neighbors and rivals. His old mother had not a hundred of coal to begin the winter with, and his own chances of Jenny, which had looked so bright as he started, seemed more distant than ever.

It was "aggrewaiting," as he said, poor fellow, and it was not unnatural that he should have listened to the two pairs of banns which had been put up in church for the first time last Sunday very much as if they had been intended for personal insults to himself.

The big boats had come in to land their tackle a week ago, and then, what with noisy fish-sales on the beach and shouting men and women hauling in the lines and heavy ropes, and crab-boats pulling backwards and forwards through the breakers, Shippon for a time had been all excitement and life. Now the bustle was all over.

Only a few of the crews were back from Harmouth, and the weather had been so unsettled that none of the small boats had ventured out, and the beach was almost deserted. It happened that when Jenny broke into the group on the cliff they had just been discussing the horizon, and had come to the conclusion that it was going to be an uncommonly ugly night, and the consequence was that there was by no means the eager competition she considered there ought to have been for the honor of going to sea to catch her a fish.

"Now, come, one of you must go. Come, Joe, you will, won't you, that's a dear? I don't know how many people there ain't a-coming to the Hall. There was the Squire himself come down this morning, and says 'Jenny,' says he, 'if you don't get me a fish, I don't know what I won't do to you. I doubt I'll have to have you cooked yourself.' You would not like that now, Joe, would you?"

But for once blandishment and satire (and Jenny was a good hand at both) were thrown away, and not even the last terrible suggestion of the Squire's turbot-kettle could win her point, so the pretty girl tossed her head and said, in her most contemptuous tone "You ain't none on you fit to catch a dog-fish. I won't have nothin' more to say to you," and went off in a huff.

Joe Crask had been standing with the others, but except to answer Jenny when she appealed directly to him, he had taken no part in the conversation.

He watched her light figure tripping up the street till she turned a corner out of sight; and then, with his hands in his pockets, he sauntered down the gangway and over the breakwater, till he came to a gap in the cliff where a little stream of fresh water runs down a hollow and loses itself among the loose shingles on the beach. A narrow plank bridge crosses it about a hundred yards or so from the shore, and there Joe stopped, in the hope of meeting Jenny, who lived with an old grandfather in a cottage on the opposite cliff. It was beginning to get dusk already; and he had not waited many minutes before he caught a glimpse of a print dress fluttering down the winding path, and she was beside him.

"Stop a minute, Jenny dear," he said. (The plank was only broad enough for one, and he stood on it.) "Wait a minute, Jenny. I brought this for you from Harmouth. You'll take it, won't you?" It was a few yards of blue ribbon. "I would ha' brought something better, Jenny, only you know I wasn't lucky."

Now Jenny, like most pretty girls, was a bit of a tyrant; and, like all tyrants, was not fond of being thwarted. She had set her heart on getting a fish for the Hall, and as it was not to be had, she felt personally aggrieved, and was not at all sorry for an opportunity of snubbing poor Joe, who she knew, would care for it.

"Thank you, I'm verry much obliged; but I don't want any ribbins. When I do, I'll buy them myself. Good night! please let me come by, I must go home."

"I brought it o' purpose for you, Jenny; I thought you'd ha' liked it. Do stop a minute, Jenny; I'll come with you. It ain't safe to go to sea, Jenny; it ain't indeed, or I'd go out in a minute. You know I would Jenny."

"Thank you. I don't ask nobody to go if they're afraid! Please let me come by; I'm late." She pushed by him; but he held her.

"Jenny! Jenny! don't speak to me like that. I hain't seen you once since afore the fishing, and I can't abide to have you speak to me o' that manner, Jenny. Stop a minute, do; Jenny! dear Jenny!"

She was gone, and Joe was supremely miserable. It was dark before he left the bridge. "Hankering arter that gall again," thought his old mother, as she gave him his supper, before he went off to bed at seven o'clock. "Them gals don't know when they be well off. Higgetty-jigging things they be, so aggerwatin'! She ain't wuth him."

* * * * * * *

At half-past eight o'clock punctually the next morning Squire Lindon came down into the dining-room at the Hall, and rang the bell for prayers.

He was a fine tall man of fifty-six; the age at which Mrs. Norton maintains that a handsome man is most picturesque.

He had a pleasant, open face, a broad forehead, thin, curly hair, and a color which smacked unmistakably of sea-breezes and exercises in the open air. Shippon had belonged to his family since 1370, when a Lindon (if tradition speaks true, no better than he should have been) had received the heiress in payment of a bad debt from Edward III.

The estate was extensive, though anything but a rich one.

The greater part consisted of heathy hills, and the land which was under cultivation was very poor. Though, however, there were many wealthier men in the country, none held their heads higher than Squire Lindon. He was proud of his fine old old house, with the family motto and "Laus Deo" in venerable gray stone letters running, as a balustrade, the whole length of the front; proud—(will wiser readers smile at him?)—of the sacred inheritance of family tradition and a good old name; and all the more fondly proud of his only daughter Edith, a bright girl of nineteen, because her laughing brown eyes and fair waving hair were precisely those of a beautiful picture by Lely, which held an honored place among the family portraits that hung over the black oak staircase and covered the panelled walls of the great stone hall. She came into the room and held up her face to be kissed, just as he had finished reading his letters and was cutting his newspaper.

"I'll tell you what it is, Miss Paleface," he said, as he took the little upturned face in both hands and kissed it tenderly; "I'll tell you what it is, we must not have any more dancing if we can't get our roses back for two days after it. Hadn't we better make mamma write and tell the stupid people not to come on Thursday? Eh, Miss? what do you say?"

"Oh, papa! how it has been blowing. It woke me at half-past three, and I could not get to sleep again at all. Jane says Holland was up here just before she came to me and told her more than fifty trees were blown down between four and five. Oh, I do hope all the boats are safe at Harmouth before now."

"It's off shore, darling, and I don't think it will have done any mischief here except to my trees; but go and look on the table, and see if you can't find anything to bring back those roses."

The missing roses did come back in a minute as Edith snatched up a letter. It was from her brother's college chum, Sir Arthur Hamlin, the fortunate heir of some seven thousand a year in a ring fence not thirty miles from Shippon: more fortunate still in his own estimation in having won the love of the sweetest girl in the country, and being engaged to Edith Lindon.

"Well, dear, when is he coming?" asked Mrs. Lindon. A large party was expected at the Hall the next day, for a week's shooting and a ball, and Sir Arthur, as a matter of course, was to be one. "Will he wait to pick up Henry at Cambridge, or will he come over to-night?"

"I don't know, mamma; I expect he'll very likely be here to-night. He says, 'My new yacht, the Edith, is at Wellport. If it's very fine indeed, perhaps I shall bring her round to Shippon for you to see. I have had some alterations made in the cabin, and I know you will like her. If the weather is in the least bad, I shall look out for Henry at Norborough, and drive over on Tuesday night or Wednesday morning.' He'll be here to-day, I know he will! It was so windy yesterday morning that he would not have gone down to Wellport at all, so he'll be sure to be over with Henry this afternoon. I must go down to Lower Shippon this morning."

"My darling, indeed you musn't do any such thing," said Mrs Lindon: "I can't think of letting you go at all in such weather. Why, it's raining hard; you would catch cold and be laid up all the week, if you were not blown away over the cliff. You know you would."

"Oh, mamma, please; I've got ever so many things I must do, and I shan't have another chance. Please do let me, mamma."

"Well, dear, we will see how it looks after lunch; you must take a book and be quiet till then. You haven't got rested after the Hurton dance yet, so give me another cup of coffee, and then finish your own breakfast, like a good child."

The sun had found its way through the rolling clouds, and the wind had dropped before Edith had finished her book, and luncheon was ready. So her ponies were ordered, and she drove off, armed with plenty of wrappers and a basket of jellies and soup. About half way down from the Hall to the village, a fisherman stopped her to say that old Susan Crask was in trouble again. Her boy Joe had got up early in the morning and gone out to sea alone, without saying a word to any one, just before the squall.

They had missed his boat on the beach, and a man coming along shore some hours after had picked up one of his oars, and a bailing-tin which was recognized as his; and "I ax your pardon, miss," the old fellow went on, "but I was just a-coming up to tell you. Susan she takes on terrible about it, and I thought, miss, as how mayhap you wish to be a-coming to see her if you knowed."

"Oh! I'll go now at once. I am so sorry. Whatever could have made him go out such a morning?—and all alone, too. Oh, how shocking it is! Poor old Susan."

The old man shook his head mysteriously, and said in a lower tone, "They do say, miss, as how it was Jenny Cooper made him go to get her a fish. They do say so. They was a-keepin' company, you know, miss."

In a very few minutes Edith was at the cottage. She tapped quietly, and went in. The room into which the door opened was low and dark; but the floor was neatly sanded, and everything, from the bottles of different-colored sands and the model ship on the chimney-piece to the old-fashioned walnut drawers against the opposite walls, was carefully dusted and scrupulously clean.

In a low chair, in front of the little fire which burnt in a corner of the grate, sat Susan Crask, rocking herself slowly backwards and forwards, and moaning every now and then. Beside her stood Jenny, pale and silent, with a touching, wistful look in her eyes; but the old woman took no notice of her, and scarcely seemed to know she was there.

When Edith came in she made a slight movement of recognition, but said nothing, and went on rocking herself as before. Edith's own eyes were so dim that she saw nothing of the hopeless look in poor Jenny's face as she handed her a chair.

"Poor dear old Susan!" she said, as she took the old woman's horny hand in hers. "Poor dear old Susan!"

There was a silence, broken only by Susan's moans which were deeper than before, and the hollow tickings of the old upright clock in the corner. At last she spoke.

"I knewed how 'twor—I knewed how 'twor when I heard his voice come in at the window. I knewed what that meant. Father, brothers, husband, and now my boy! Oh! Joe, Joe, Joe! to forget old mother for a pink murderin' hissey!" The flood-gates were open, and the old woman sobbed like a child.

Poor Jenny! Her punishment had come quickly—a bitter punishment it was, poor girl. What might have been, and what was; how different all seemed now, now that it was too late—now that his mother had called her his murderess. Poor child! She dared stay no longer, and too miserable to care where she went or what she did, she stole noiselessly to the door and out into the street. The men and women looked at her and whispered as she passed; but she took no notice of anything, and hurried through the little narrow turnings which lead out past the houses into the field beyond the village. There she was alone. For the length of a field or two the cliff above Shippon gets gradually higher, till at the "Sugar-loaf" it towers up three hundred feet above the sea. A little beyond the highest point a huge mass of the upper soil and turf, loosened probably by the landsprings, has become detached, and slipped bodily down, and rests suspended between sea and sky, a hundred feet from the top of the cliff and a hundred and fifty or more from the beach below.

There is a great charm about the "Gull's Nest," as the spot is called. You seem to overhang the sea. Wherever you look is sea, nothing but sea. To the left is sea, stretching away to a low line of purple shore in the dim distance, fringed at all times with a hazy line of white foam. At times, when the sun is setting over a full spring-tide, you may see ships in a stream of gold behind the line of purple. That is Rakeston Harbor—ten miles off. To the right, beyond the sharp chalk needles which hem in the Gull's Nest on that side, you look over sea unlimited—sea which seems to rise up and mix with the sky.

But the view had no charms for Jenny. She scrambled down the cliff, and threw herself down out of sight, out of hearing of the village, among the damp grass, and strained her eyes all over the waste of waters.

It was low tide, and the breakers were growling surlily among the naked rocks, a couple of hundred yards from the foot of the cliff. A single little schooner was tossing about far out beyond the sand-bank, almost hidden at times by the white crested waves, but not a sign of his boat. She hid her face in her hands, and cried as if her heart would break.

The wind had veered round since the morning, and was blowing now in short, uncertain gusts from the sea. Jenny had nothing on her head, and was cold and shivering, when something colder even than her own poor little wet cheek, touched it for a moment. Edith's pet white and yellow setter had found her, and looked at her with a puzzled expression in his great hazel eyes as she started up, just in time to see his mistress climbing down to her. Edith had heard which way she had gone, and had come to look for her.

"Come home, Jenny," she said, gently, "don't stop out in the cold any longer. How wet you are! You'll make yourself ill, and then what will become of poor old Tim?"

"Oh, miss!—oh, miss! that's all my fault. I wish I was dead, I do!" and she threw herself down again, chocking with a fresh burst of tears.

There is something wonderfully soothing and strengthening in sympathy. It seems almost as if every sorrow, small or great, brought a certain appointed weight of pain with it—a weight which must be carried somehow or other. No friend may relieve us of our share altogether, but a kindly helping hand may ease the weight as surely as if the burden were material.

Jenny, like old Susan, found it so; and both felt their hearts a little lighter before Edith drove away. She had not started a minute too soon; her ponies were not long in whisking her home, but the wind had begun to blow hard, and she had only just time to run down to the greenhouse for a bunch of blue Russian larkspur for her hair, before it began to rain again.

Dinner was laid at half-past six, for five, but Edith and her father and mother sat down by themselves, half expecting every minute to hear the sound of wheels on the gravel in front, and a ring at the bell; but they were disappointed. At eleven o'clock Mr. Lindon got up and put down his book, and stretched himself in front of the drawing-room fire, and said:

"Well, I don't think these boys will turn up to-night now. If they had caught the six o'clock train they would have been here before now, so I think we had all of us better go to bed. What a noise the wind does make, to be sure; we have not had such gale all the year. Come, missy, put down your work and trot off. Here is a candle for you. I shan't be long, I know before I'm asleep for one. Give me a kiss, my darling child and say good-night."

The wind shrieked among the gables and chimney stacks, and the windows rattled till a stranger might have thought that the whole place was coming down; but the old hall had stood every storm for a good many hundred years, and was likely to stand for a good many hundred more.

The Squire was too much accustomed to the noise of a "north-easter" to let it disturb him in the least; but he had not been many minutes in bed, and was only just settling into his first sleep, when another sound caught his attention, and he started up to listen. He had not time to rub his eyes before it came again. A bang and a rattle at his window. Some one was throwing gravel against the glass. Mr. Lindon knew well enough what the noise meant, and jumped out of bed and threw up the window.

"Hulloa, is that you, Tim? What is it?"

An old man in a long oiled coat and a sou'wester stood in the garden beneath.

"What is it, Tim?"

"Skewner, sir, in agin the Gull's Neest."

"Stop there, I'll be down in a minute. Stop there."

Unfortunately a shipwreck was only too common an event at Shippon. In a very few minutes Mr. Lindon was dressed and had waked the butler and given orders.

"Wake George, and tell him to put the brown horse in the omnibus, and to take plenty of rugs and coats and wait at the Lindon Arms, to be ready if he is wanted. Tell him to send one of the boys on "Lady Grey" as hard as he can ride, to Captain James for the mortar, and be sure there is a good fire kept up in the kitchen."

Squire Lindon and Tim fought their way as best they could against the hurricane. It was slow work, and the "bus" was at the village almost before they reached the Gull's Nest by a short cut.

There it was no easy matter to stand at all. The huge waves were thundering half way up the cliff, and the sea, wherever they could catch a glimpse of it through the blinding shower of foam flakes which blew in their faces, was black as ink. A single light showed the direction of the doomed vessel, and every now and then, as she rose for a moment on some giant wave, they could see her black hull and spars against the sky. She had cleared the shoal, and was driving straight in for the "Needles."

"If she strikes there," said a coastguard man, as the wind dropped for a few seconds, "that will be all over very quick."

If only she could round the point (but who on board was to know that) there was a chance of saving the crew, if the mortar arrived in time. A chance; but a desperate one. It would be hopeless to attempt to get the life-boat off in such a sea. It was only in the momentary lull that the crowd of eager watchers on the cliff could hear one another speak.

"What is she?" shouted the Squire. "Can you make her out?"

"Not altogether, sir; she seemed a'most as though she was a standing in this arternoon, afore the wind changed. She appear more like a big yacht nor anything. I doubt that's what she is."

A gentle hand was laid on the Squire's arm. He started as he looked round and saw his daughter.

"My child, how could you?"—

"Papa, papa, it's the Edith!" and she fell hopeless into his arms.

Edith had not gone to bed when she left the drawing-room. She had sent her maid away, and sat down in an easy chair in front of her fire, and had fallen asleep and was dreaming when the noise in the house roused her. Her first idea was that Sir Charles and her brother had come; but very soon she understood that it was a wreck; and, seized with a horrible, indefinite dread, such as she had never felt before, she snatched up her hat and a thick cloak and veil and ran down stairs, just as the "bus" was starting, and jumped in.

The first words which caught her ear on the cliff were, "She appears more like a big yacht nor anything; I doubt that's what she is."

The fatigues of a day of unusually painful excitement, the solitary night-drive from the Hall, and the last crowning agony of finding her worst fears realized, had been too much for the slight, delicate girl, and overtaxed nature brought its own relief. Her father lifted her up, and carried her, fainting, to the village. A light in Widow Crask's window showed that she was still up; he pushed the door open, and laid Edith down on the old woman's bed, and knelt beside her, holding up her head, while Jenny, who had followed them down the cliff, and Susan bathed her temples with vinegar and chafed her cold hands and feet. It was some time (to her father it seemed ages) before she showed any signs of returning life; but at last she opened her eyes and looked dreamily round her. As soon as Jenny had seen her move, she pulled her shawl over her head, and left them noiselessly, to learn the worst. Her hand was almost on the latchet of the door, when it opened. A confused sound of voices reached her from the street, and a tall, dark figure, with dripping hair and clothes and naked feet, stood in front of her. For a moment Jenny thought she saw a ghost; the next, she gave a scream, burst into tears, and threw her arms round Joe's neck. They were no ghost's lips which met hers. The breath on her forehead was warm. It was Joe himself, alive from the dead—alive and well.

"All on us safe!" Squire Lindon and Edith heard it. "All on us safe, thank heaven!"

How Joe came there is soon told. The squall in the morning had caught him as he was hauling in his line. He had lost one of his oars, and had drifted out to sea, and had tossed about helpless for hours. The wave which had carried away his oar had half-filled his boat, and he had been obliged to keep bailing with his sou'wester as best he could. He had almost given up altogether when, from the top of a wave, he sighted a vessel close by him; in a minute he had stripped off his red handkerchief, and hoisted it as a signal of distress on his boat-hook, and in less than half-an-hour, by one of those providences which we call lucky chances, found himself on board Sir Arthur Hamlin's yacht, just about the time that Edith was driving home to the Hall. As Jenny had noticed when she left the "Gull's Nest," the wind had chopped quite round, and was blowing hard, with a strong tide on shore. The sea, which had been high all the day, was still making fast, and by the time he had had a mouthful to eat and drink below, it was almost pitch dark. Joe had been born and bred at Shippon; he had been out in big boats and little boats, rough and smooth, light and dark, till he knew every yard of the coast, for ten miles, as well as he knew the village itself. When he came on deck again a single glance was enough to show him that the Edith was on the shoal. Another minute, and she would be hard and fast aground. "Port your helm!" he shouted, at the top of his voice, and sprang to the wheel. The storm jib, the only canvas she was carrying, flapped empty for a moment; the next, a huge roller lifted her high out of the water. There was a hollow, grating sound, and the vessel shook from stem to stern. In another moment she was in deep water inside the bank.

"Touch and go, sir. Better cast out a couple of anchors, or we shall be on the Needles afore we know where we are."

At half-past eleven the storm was still increasing: the hatches were down, and everything made snug. The yacht still rode head to the wind; but the waves were awful. Sir Arthur and Joe were together on deck, holding on as best they could. Five minutes before the cliffs had looked through the darkness like black uncertain clouds resting on the water. Now they could see the "Sugarloaf" frowning, huge and sharp, out against the sky. The terrible truth flashed on them both at the same moment. The anchors held no longer, and they were drifting in.

"Cut her free, for heaven's sake!" shouted Joe. "If we can get her round the Needles we may get a rope ashore; if not, we are done for."

A very few minutes after the Squire had left them, the watchers on the cliff saw the vessel give a lurch and spring in. Another bound and the point was cleared, and the Edith lay a wreck, with the spent waves breaking over her, wedged fast in the little bay at the foot of the "Gull's Nest."

There was a pause for a minute or two. To those on deck it seemed ages. Then came a red flash from the land, and a roar that was heard above the sea. A shot whizzed far out over their heads, and a rope fell across the vessel's bows. In half an hour's time the last sailor was safe on the cliff.

Our readers must picture for themselves the happiness which changed the old woman's tumble-down cottage into a palace that night. We will not attempt to describe with what humble, grateful tears the widow received back her boy from the dead; nor even how the pretty Jenny forgot her coquettishness for once, and clung round Joe's neck before half the village, like an April day sun and showers together. Above all we will not venture to intrude into the little inner room. Mr. Lindon himself did not, and Edith was alone when she met her lover.

The Sunday after the storm three pairs of banns were put in church instead of two. The names of the last couple were "Joseph Crask and Jane Cooper."

IMAGINATION.

WE are inclined to think that imagination is next to "God's greatest gift to man." It is true that it will not fill no empty stomach, but it will impart to poverty a glow, and to wretchedness a lustre that no fabled wealth could purchase. Happiness, transient though it be, but all the more vivid for its evanescent nature, can be had for the asking, and desires too heavenly within the reach of mortal, even through the aid of wealth, can be indulged to the heart's content. Imagination fills the perspective with a radiance, that no matter how unbounded the success attained, is never found on reaching the object in pursuit. It tints with such vivid colors the objects sought for, while in the distance, that it makes pursuit far more delightful than possession, and in fact, so powerful can imagination be in this respect, that it can clog the senses, so as to make possession a disappointment instead of a satisfaction. It is an overflowing fount of blessings from which the poor may draw at will, and as the most of mankind are led by their own ideas, as to the happiness or misery of their existence, till some rude shock from the outside world shows them that others, too, have thoughts and feelings, happy are they whose imagination pictures contentment and tinges the ill of life with the mellow hues of connubial bliss. Imagination, like everything else, must be controlled, not allowed to run in the soul; for an imagination too ardent is almost sure to bring about reactions that will, in time, prove worse enemies than ennui, causing great havoc among the various custodians of mortal's peace. Besides madness is not so distant a relative of imagination as to be lost sight of, for in the event of over exertion on the part of that functionary, madness might take advantage of its prostration, and usurp the throne of reason, and then would chaos reign supreme. A curb must therefore be placed upon it, and indulgences of too strong a nature must be denied the mind, even if they be ever so delightful. It must be cultivated and improved, for to it we owe all that is new or novel to mankind. From its depths poets inspiration draw, and even the matter of fact men of science do not hesitate to call in its assistance, when some new discovery or invention is needed, for the promulgation and furtherance of scientific progression. All minds need it, use it, and often abuse it, and but few are grateful for this precious boon conferred by an All-Wise Creator, as some compensation for the sufferings humanity, by its obstinate perseverance in wrong pursuits, inflicts upon itself.

DIAMONDS OF GOLCONDA.—It appears that the celebrated diamond mines of Golconda, in India, so far from being likely to give out—as has been reported—have as yet been imperfectly worked. An English officer in the Madras army, who has recently visited the mines—if mines they can be called—says they have hardly yet been worked at all; that most of the diamonds thus far obtained have been found near the surface—the richer sort lying deep in the bowels of the earth, and that the natives having no appliances for digging, beyond a crowbar, seldom excavate below twenty feet in depth, though it is found that the deeper they go the larger and richer and more abundant the diamonds are found. Beside diamonds, other precious stones are turned out of these holes; as rubies garnets, opals, catseyes, monstones, etc.

A WAR PUMP.—Herr Struvé, of Heidelberg, speaks of an engine of terrible power of destruction, which he calls a pump of war, as it pumps up and sends flinging three hundred bullets a minute, of any weight up to eight pounds, a distance of two miles. It may be worked by eight men, or by steam. Herr Struvé was known as a patriot during the Baden insurrection, in 1848.

WE may be in far better health to-day than we were yesterday, but we are nearer dissolution.

HUMAN glory is not always glorious. The best men have had their calumniators, the worst their panegyrists.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JULY 13, 1867.

A JOKE OR NO JOKE?*

THIS second attempt at authorship by a famous, if not distinguished writer, is worthy of note as one of the most extraordinary literary cnriosities of the day, if not on account of its intrinsic merit or value. It is a stout volume of nearly five hundred pages, abounding from beginning to end with quotations from an immense number of authors, all going to establish the propositions that "The negro anthropologically considered," is "an inferior fellow," that "Black" is "a thing of ugliness, disease and death," while "White is a thing of life, health and beauty;" that "In nothing are any of these paltry creatures the suggestors or promotors of the world's advancement," and that happily "In the present economy of Nature, there are Causes in constant operation which will, ere long, exterminate from the fair face of the earth every one of the non-white drones and sluggards, and vagabonds." To establish these propositions (which we have taken care to state in the chaste language of the anthor) he cites so varied and numerons an array of authorities, as entitles the volume to the character of an anti-negro encyclopedia, and would have made it invaluable to a certain class of stump-speakers, had it appeared prior to the last Presidential election. Even as it is, though in some respects like a child born ont of due season, there are not a few partisan editors in California and elsewhere, who will find it highly useful in their journalistic labors, and richly suggestivo of that peculiar style of argnment in which they chiefly delight. The range of witnesses cited to prove the case against the "black, brown, and all non-white races," covers a period of more than a thonsand years, embracing Artabanns and Agassiz, Addison and John Adams, Boyle and Bancroft, Confucius and Clay. It includes philosophers, theologians, historians, naturalists, poets, and politicians. A paragraph from Bacon is followed by a stanza from Byron; Herodotns and Mrs. Hemans are snmmoned to the witness stand at a brief interval. Ovid's "Art of Love" is quoted at page 140 to prove "the powerful smell" of the negro, or, as Mr. Helper more forcibly phrases it (for he has a manly detestation of feeble forms of expression) "the vile and vomit provoking stench," of the "non-white caitiff," and on page 141, we find a dozen lines from Chaucer's "Conrt of Love," designed doubtless to strengthen Mr. Helper's case against "black" as a color, by the enthusiastic praises bestowed npon a "forehead fair," cheeks of "lovely red and white," and "snowy hands."

Thus far, we have confined our comments to the quotations, of which the book principally consists. But it is, after all, the original matter by which these liberal excerots are cemented, that constitutes the most unique featnre of Mr. Helper's volume. We do not see how it is possible to read a dozen pages of this original matter without coming to the conclusion either that the writer is a lunatic, or that he is cunningly affecting the character in order to prodnce a sensation and realize a pecuniary profit thereby. In his preface, the anthor states with engaging frankness and candor that it is "the primary object of this work to write the negro ont of America," and that "the secondary object is to write him (and manifold millions of other bi-colored caitiffs, little better than himself) out of existence." Without pausing to give expression to our admiration of the philanthropic spirit that inspired Mr. Helper to take upon himself the "bloody business" of destroying considerably more than one-half the present popnlation of our globe, we cannot refrain from calling attention to the ingenuous faith he reposes in the venerable apothegm that "the pen is mightier than the sword." All the armies and navies of Europe and America nnited, would prove inadequate to the task of annihilating these "black and bi-colored caitiffs;" but Mr. Hinton Rowan Helper, of North Carolina, author of the "Impending Crisis," is confident that he can accomplish the great work without the necessity of an appeal to the potency of lead and gunpowder. Races that have existed from the earliest historical period, and that have occupied and still occupy nearly one-half the globe, are now to be summarily "written out of existence" by the exterminating pen of Mr. Hinton Rowan Helper, that redoubtable weapon being mightily reinforced, as far, at least, as the present volume is concerned, by a most prodigal use of the scissors.

If our anthor could only discover some mode of compelling every member of the "non-white races" to read, or hear read, the volume which has been produced by these combined agencies, though chiefly by the latter, we think he would be in a fair way of achieving the beneficent task which he proposes to himself in his preface. Not even the hardiest Caucasian constitution could survive such an infliction. This, however, is not the practical step suggested by Mr. Helper, as the first to be taken. Instead of resorting at the outset to a mode of execution that might, perhaps, be stigmatized as unnecessarily cruel, he urges a preliminary trial of milder measures. He thinks that an "absolute separation of the two races" may possibly supercede the necessity of killing off the black or "bi-colored" one. This separation, he tells us, may be secured in two ways: First, "by giving full and formal notice to the negroes—every one of them, including the mulattoes, the quadroons, the octaroons, and all the other non-whites, that, after the 4th of July, 1876, their presence would be no longer required nor tolerated, north of the northern boundary of Mexico, and by assisting them to a limited extent to get somewhere (it would matter very little where) south of that south-moving boundary:" or second, by colonizing "all impure-complexioned persons, of whatever nationality, whether black or brown, whether negroes, or Indians, or Chinamen, or bi-colored hybrids, now resident in the United States, (for the present, at least,) in a territory by themselves, in Texas or in Arizona, for instance, and there, under suitable regulations, required to remain strictly within the limits assigned them." Such are the practical steps mercifully recommended by Mr. Helper to begin with. Should these fail, or be found to involve too much trouble and inconvenience, he has still a third remedy, at which he hints in his sixth chapter, significantly entitled, "A Score of Bible Lessons in the Arts of Annihilating Effete Races." If that method too, should prove impracticable, there still remains as a last resource, the cruel remedy that we have ourselves suggested.

* NOJOQUE: A QUESTION FOR A CONTINENT. By Hinton Rowan Helper, of North Carolina, Author of "The Impending Crisis of The South." New York: George W. Charleton & Co., Publishers. San Francisco: H. H. Bancroft & Co.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

IN BONDS. A Novel. By Laura Preston. A. Roman & Co., Booksellers, Publishers and Importers, 417 and 419 Montgomery street, San Francisco. 17 Mercer street, New York. 1867.

It is very difficult to read this novel through, without conceiving the snspicion that it is either the work of two writers of very different powers, or of the same writer at two widely different stages of culture and intellectual developement. Up to the commencement of the sixteenth Chapter, the critical reader looks in vain for the first indication of even that very moderate share of talent and skill discernible in the work of the hack novelist of the second and third rate periodicals. Nothing can be more flat and jejune than the narrative up to the point mentioned. The dead insipidity of those first fifteen chapters is unrelieved by a single striking bit of description, an observation or reflection worth the trouble of recording, or even an occasional neatly turned paragraph. The characters, thus far introduced and developed, are the stiffest and most wooden of lay figures, destitute of any sign of life, or any touch of nature. The style is that of a school girl's compositiou, at that period of her training when she is most helplessly under the spell of the "fatal adjective;" and the reader finds none of these indications of crude power, or undeveloped genius, which hold forth promise of something better in the future, when the taste shall have had time to mature, and observation and experience shall have exerted their legitimate influence.

But in the sixteenth chapter, a most remarkable change makes itself perceptible. The style suddenly becomes clear and vigorous, the narrative begins to wax interesting, the new characters introduced are, most of them, well conceived, graphically sketched, and consistently sustained, while the old ones undergo a corresponding transformation. The Claude Leveredge, of the first part of the book, is nothing more than a stock piece of melo-dramatic furniture, who rolls his eyes, struts, and declaims bifalntin hosh: but the individual bearing the same name, who reappears at Norton Holmes' plantation, is a powerful, and not altogether an unnatural character, who, if he occasionally talks in a somewhat stagy dialect, does not overdo the matter more than is conceivable of heroes of his peculiar type in real life. Miss Adela Holmes, "Aunt Tildy," and Asenith Bray, the Quakeress, all of whom make their first appearance in the sixteenth and seventeenth chapters, are sketched with the skill of a practiced novelist. Adela Holmes, especially, is a character of decided originality, yet delineated in such a manner as to impress the reader with a full belief in her reality. Thus, from the moment when the theater of action is transferred to the plantation, the story assumes an entirely new aspect.

If we were to pass literary judgment upon the anthor of "In Bonds," from the evidence of the first fifteen chapters, we should pronounce her altogether wanting in the qualifications necessary in a writer of fiction, and earnestly advise her to refrain from any further attempt in that direction; while, if our verdict were to be founded upon the later portion of the story, it would be that, regarded as the work of a beginner, the novel gives indications of uncommon talent. How the same person who drew so preposterous a character as that of Harold De Grey, and the uncertainly sketched and feeble, or ridiculous, individualities by which he is surrounded, could have invented and sustained Adela Holmes, her odd aunt, and the good Quakeress, is a puzzle that we cannot solve; and we are equally at a loss to understand how a writer capable of giving such clever and spirited sketches of plantation life as this volume contains could have penned and published anything so juvenile as many of the scenes and conversations in the opening chapters—as that, for instance, so provocative of mirth, though evidently designed to produce quite a different effect, where the melo-dramatic Claude informs "La Guerita" that "this hand in a foolish, boyish quarrel, drew life-blood once," etc., and threatened that it "should yet draw your heart's bitterest tears," etc, adding the terrific declaration; "I am not one to utter meaningless threats, and remember, as surely as there is a God in Heaven you shall have bitter cause to rue the hour in which you have slighted and scorned Claude Leveredge," and concluding his speech with a long-winded poetical quotation. The idea of setting a man to spouting poetry, in such a terribly earnest scene as the author evidently meant the one in question to be, is not, however, more preposterous than many of the scenes and incidents that precede the point where the heroine resolves upon her scheme of expiation—the most preposterous thing of all, besides being practically impossible, since it would puzzle even so accomplished a lawyer as the author evidently desires us to understand Ernest Gordon to have been, to draw up a document, by signing which a free person could "enter into bonds."

The most favorable judgment we can honestly pronounce upon this novel is, that if it is a first attempt, and the author a very young person and an inexperienced writer, it is a creditable performance as indicating talent and giving promise of something better in the future; but, estimated by any positive standard, with sole reference to its intrinsic merits as a whole, it is by no means worthy of the admirable dress in which the publishers have arrayed it.

MISS RAVENEL'S CONVERSION FROM SECESSION TO LOYALTY. By J. W. De Forrest, Anthor of "European acquaintance," "Sea Cliff," etc., etc. New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers. 1867. San Francisco: H. H. Bancroft & Co.

"Sea Cliff," though a novel, or rather a romance, of marked originality and uncommon power, failed for some reason, to gain that degree of popularity, which one would naturally have predicted from its elements of mystery and strong sensational interest. Possibly, the public taste for the modern ultra-sensational shool of fiction, had not yet been cultivated up to the point of full appreciation of the strange, the startling, the horrible, and the preposterous, which it has now attained. At any rate, although the "villain" of "Sea Cliff," was quite as striking as the most accomplished and fascinating of Miss Braddon's; although the plot was wrought with singular skill, exciting intense curiosity at the outset, and successfully baffling it until the denouement; although several of the characters, though certainly such as are fortunately strange and rare in real life, were drawn with so much artistic talent that they scarcely impressed the reader as being unnatural, until the volume was finally closed, and the spell of the narrative broken; in spite of all these elements of popularity, Mr. De Forrest's romance was not extensively read, and is now little known.

Those, however, who retain any distinct recollection of "Sea Cliff," will find a surprise in "Miss Ravenel's Conversion." In several respects, the latter is one of the very best novels ever written in America, but there is not a trace of exaggeration or sensationalism in it. The style is brilliant, yet pure, the dialogue is admirable, and upon the whole, we think, better than that of any living writer of fiction, except "George Eliot." It is animated and sparkling, yet never studied or artificial; and it is perfectly natural and colloquial, without ever becoming insipid. It is also perfectly characteristic and individual. No two characters talk alike, and not one talks "like a book." Doctor Ravenel is wise and full of philosophic insight, yet he never lectures, or becomes a bore. His daughter's conversation is that of an intelligent, quick-witted high-bred woman—but is always unmistakeably feminine; while Col. Carter's talk belongs so thoroughly to his character, that one needs no description of the man after listening to him for a quarter of an hour. The characters, are few, but they are admirably drawn; or rather, they are photographed. One cannot convince himself that the sagacious and delightful "doctor," the simple, but high-minded "Colburne," the bluff, reckless, "honorable," but not high principled, "Carter," the Virginian and West Pointer, are not real personages. As to Mrs. Larue, she is worthy of Thackeray. Of plot, or mystery, or sensational climax, the novel has none. It is a plain, straight-forward narrative, without an incident that is improbable, or a character, unless, possibly, Mrs. Larue, that is in the least overstrained. Indeed, the air of reality that pervades the book is so strong that the reader feels throughout that it is a narrative dealing with incidents witnessed by the writer, and with persons he knew. The battle scenes are very different indeed from the rhetorical descriptions of Times' correspondents which have been so highly esteemed. They are simple and soldierly, but far more effective than any of the wordy pictures of Headley or Russell, The defence of the fort in Louisiana, the battle in which Colburne is wounded, that in which Carter fell, together with the military movements that immediately precede it, are described in a manner so luminous that the reader, however unskilled in such matters, understands it all, and in a style so graphic, that he seems to be an eye-witness. But the author's familiarity with military affairs is no greater than his knowledge of the political machinery by which they are so much controlled, and the influences by which promotion is often secured. The Governor who finds himself compelled by party pressure, in opposition to his own inclination and conscience, to give a regiment to a man whose incompetence and ignorance are known, and whose actual cowardice has been proved in the field, is no fancy sketch; and the whole situation is set forth in detail, in such a way as to leave no doubt that the writer is describing an actual occurrence.

Of the characters, Carter is the most thoroughly life-like, and the most carefully studied, From his first appearance at the Whitewood dinner-party to the end, his every word and act are consistent and characteristic. To have delineated with complete success, this man of such chivalrous honor as a soldier, yet so weak in principle outside of his profession, of good impulses and shameful vices, of dauntless courage and utter infirmity of purpose, a man who loathes the thought of dishonor yet defrauds the government, who truly loves his young wife yet yields to the blandishments of an artful woman whom he does not love, nay, whom he positively dislikes, to have achieved a perfect picture of such a man, physically, mentally, morally, so that every reader knows his countenance, and becomes his familiar acquaintance, to have shown in him the subtle play and conflict of good and evil, and to have worked up the entire character with such insight and impartial skill, that it is as impossible wholly to dislike, as thoroughly to admire the man, to have done all this as Mr De Forrest has done it, is certainly proof of rare talent, though not of the ideal genius of a great novelist.

There are a number of passages and descriptions which we had marked for quotation, and among them a portion of the very amusing, and, at the same time, instructive sketch of Doctor Ravenel's experiment in organizing freedman labor on a Louisiana plantation, but we cannot make room for them at present.

Aunt Margaret's Trouble; a Tale of Love, Selfishness and Retribution. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Brothers. San Francisco: A. Roman & Co.

The authorship of this charming story, which has enjoyed the rare distinction of receiving unstinted praise at the hands of such high critical authority as the Saturday Review, is attributed to a daughter of Charles Dickens. It is pervaded by an atmosphere of delicacy, truth, and tenderness, not to be found in the works of the popular novelists of the day. We are gratified to note, however, in several quarters, indications of a reaction against exaggerated and sensational fiction. Such a reaction has indeed actually begun, and we are not without hope that the time will come when such tales as this will be more in demand than romances of the Miss Braddon school. But there will have to be a marked improvement in the popular taste, and a healthier tone of popular sentiment before this will be the case.

Neighbor's Wives. By J. T. Trowbridge, Author of "Neighbor Jackwood," "Father Brighthopes," etc. Boston: Lee & Shepard. San Francisco: H. H. Bancroft & Co.

Mr. Trowbridge commenced this story as a serial in Northern Lights, which was founded as a rival of the Atlantic Monthly, but ceased to shine, after two monthly illuminations we believe. The author however, completed it, and it is now published in a handsome volume. It is one of the best of that class of stories of New England life, that though of comparatively recent origin, constitute the most distinctive and characteristic feature of our literature. The characters all belong to the soil, and are drawn with strength and fidelity, and the story, though carried on with an air of sober truthfulness, is neither tame, nor lacking in incident. It belongs to the realistic, rather than the romantic school; and though in the denouement, rewards for the good, and punishments for the guilty are not distributed in the orthodox manner of the old-fashioned novelists, the moral tone of the book is thoroughly sound and wholesome. In vindication of his departure from the venerable melodramatic usage of killing of all the villains and bestowing fortune and matrimonial felicity upon the virtuous, Mr. Trowbridge offers the suggestion that perhaps the greatest punishment of all, in the sight of a higher wisdom, is to permit the guilty to live on, unrepentant and unchecked, a life of selfishness and sin.

A number of book notices prepared for the present issue of the Californian, are reserved until next week for lack of space.

THE INSULT TO THE FLAG. TEMPEST IN AN EGG SHELL.

[COMPILED FROM VARIOUS SOURCES.]

BY DOGBERRY.

IT will be recollected that on the Fourth of July it was reported that an egg was thrown by two Englishmen, from the windows of the Russ House, striking one of the national ensigns in the procession. The following telegrams received at Washington, relative to the affair, will serve to show how the aggravating features of the supposed insult have been gradually modified, until at last the tempest has ended where it commenced—in an egg shell. The spirit of the Press in relation to this ovlary insult, is also shown by the various editorials relative to the affair.

FIRST DISPATCH.

Our flag, borne in the Fourth of July procession, has been insulted! By an egg!! A rotten egg! Projected from the windows of the Russ House, by two Englishmen from Victoria!!! We demand redress! Down with the English! Make them apologize! Call out the army and navy!! Let the guns of Alcatraz be pointed at the Russ House!!

EDITORIAL.

We call the attention of our readers in to-day's paper, to the outrageous and flagitious insult offered to our glorious flag, by two Englishmen, from Victoria, on the Fourth of July. An insult like this, on such an occasion, and in time of profound peace, should be promptly apologized for, or promptly punished. Are these haughty Islanders emboldened to commit such an act on account of the presence of their iron-clad frigate, now lying in our harbor? What is our government about? What is our government for anyway, if not to keep the stars and stripes intact from ancient and addled eggs, thrown by the arms of vain-glorious Britons.

SECOND DISPATCH.

The egg in question was not thrown by the two Englishmen, but by Miss Katy Mack. They put her up to it. A bas ze Ingleso! Let the guns of Alcatraz be pointed at the English Consulate!!

EDITORIAL.

The fact that the two Englishmen from Victoria induced a giddy young girl, a Miss Mack, to throw a rotten egg at the starry flag, the pride and boast of every American citizen, only renders their conduct still more disgraceful. Lacking the courage for the perpetration of the enormity themselves, they thrust it upon a young and innocent female. Shame upon such brutes!

THIRD DISPATCH.

The egg was not rotten! It was boiled!! Miss Mack threw it on her own responsibility.

Our English friends were not to blame.

Down with the Irish!

EDITORIAL.

With a view, perhaps, of mitigating the enormity of the insult offered on the Fourth to our glorious stars and stripes, now waving triumphantly throughout the entire length and breadth of this Union, it has been asserted that the projected egg was not rotten, but boiled—boiled hard. Does the peculiar character of the interior of the egg make any difference with regard to the nature of the insult. Will the Great American Nation stoop to the consideration of the contents of an egg? Never!

It appears also that the responsibility of the transaction is now shifted from the shoulders of the English to the Irish. Then let the strong arm of the Government fall where castigation is demanded.

FOURTH DISPATCH.

Katy Mack is an Irish chambermaid, belonging to the Russ House. She has been promptly discharged by the indignant, enraged, and patriotic proprietors. The insult offered our glorious flag, is avenged—washed out! Hooray!!

EDITORIAL.

Our citizens will probably receive, with pleasure, the intelligence that Miss Mack, the young lady of Irish birth, employed by the proprietors of the Russ House, to set regularly in order the sleeping apartments of the guests, and who, on the anniversary of our national independence, expressed her contempt for the glorious land of her adoption, "the land of the free and the home of the brave" by casting from one of the upper story windows of this palatial caravansary, a hard boiled egg, which hit the gorgeous symbol of our nationality, borne in triumph through so many bloody battles by land and sea, and never yet furled in dishonor, a flag respected wherever it is seen, from the icy and newly acquired regions of the North Pole, where the whale and walrus disport themselves in gigantic gambols, even to the regions of the sunny Pacific, where grows the palm and the cocoanut, and the dusky native unconscious of harm to any, sits himself down complacently to a meal of missionary cutlets, our citizens will rejoice, we say again, to hear that the conscientious proprietors of the Russ House promptly discharged this unpatriotic and irreverent chambermaid, who so rudely insulted the flag of the republic, by casting at it one of the tangible results of the productive efforts of our domestic fowl.

FIFTH DISPATCH.

Katy Mack didn't mean to throw the egg at the flag. She found it. She found it in a boarder's room who loved boiled eggs. Miss Mack loved boiled eggs too. She took it. She wrapped it in her handkerchief. Then she would see the procession. She ran to the window of the two Englishmen. She leaned out. She saw her sweetheart marching in the Second Artillery. She waved her kerchief at him. The egg flirted out and hit our glorious banner. Miss Mack retreated precipitately. She will have nought to do again with boiled eggs, not even on Friday. She does not now believe in eggs hard or soft. Nobody to blame. Up with the Irish!! Call back the army and navy! Return ramrods!! Apologize to the English and Irish! Pension Miss Mack for life! Present the two Englishmen from Victoria with gold medals, watches, plate, etc.

EDITORIAL.

The exciting and aggravating nature of the incident on the Fourth, was such, as for the time being, to cause every true lover of American liberty to become impervious to the close consideration of strict and impartial justice and investigation; consequently, censure for a period has rested on those who, in consequence of subsequent disclosures have been found to be undeserving of it. Great care should always be taken in the treatment of topics like these to avoid anything which may be of an irritating or inflammatory nature, neither should statements of any description be made unless the facts can in the clearest manner be proven.

The Pacific Musical Gazette.—We have received the July issue of this periodical, published by Kohler & Chase. The editor has not much to record in the way of musical doings in California, for the month of June, because nothing took place, but he presents all he has to say in an acceptable form. The leading article, "Importance of Musical Culture," is well written, and contains many useful truths. The following is particularly good, though some persons might object to the influence of music for good, being said by this enthusiastic editor, to be "far more lasting than can be produced from any other source":

"The influence of music for good is most powerful, and by far more lasting than can be produced from any other source. Who has not felt on entering the House of God the awful sublimity of his position as his soul is raised to the worship of his Creator by the influence of the swelling notes of the organ? Who has not reverently bared his head as a country's hero is being borne to his long home by his comrades to the soul-inspiring strains of the march from "Saul?" Or who has not, some time in his life, been struck by some simple ballad, which recalls pleasant memories and strikes a tender chord in his heart, causing him to remember scenes and circumstances which had for years been wiped from the "tablets of his memory?"

Keep the Money at Home.—The policy of insuring in foreign companies can scarcely be considered a good one. The Fireman's Fund Insurance Company, S. W. corner of California and Sansome streets, insures on as liberal terms as any European or Eastern insurance company, and is certainly as stable as the best of them. This is one of the oldest companies in the state It numbers among its directors many of the chief business men in California. It is most desirable that every possible means should be taken to stop the leaks through which gold drains out of California, and certainly much can be done by supporting and building up home institutions, which have been tested and proved to be equal to similar ones elsewhere.

Labor and Capital.—In California, especial advantages are offered to the farmer and mechanic for the investment of their savings. Hitherto the working man has too often been forced to pay the capitalists of this city an undue per centage for the safe-keeping of his savings. Now this is all changed. The Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Savings, established at the corner of California and Sansome streets in the Firemans' Fund Building, offers especial advantages to those who have money to deposit. The list of directors which appears in another column must give confidence to all.

Petroleum Stoves.—Every day, the convenience and economy of these stoves are becoming more widely known, and as fast as their numerous advantages are understood, they are sure to come into general use. For small families they are especially desirable. They are portable, easily managed, and for cooking purposes far more convenient, cleanly, and serviceable than any old-fashioned stove. They can be used in a room without a chimney, and emit no smoke. Every house-keeper should call at M. B. Bullard's, No. 13, Kearney street, and inspect these admirable and invaluable stoves.

A Cosmopolitan City.—Bon vivants in San Francisco can dine in the restaurants of as many nationalities as can the visitors to the Paris Exposition. Most people admire the Italian cuisine. At G. Lazzerevich's Italian Restaurant, 515 Merchant street, a first-class Italian dinner, comprising soup, fish, entrees, wine, desert and coffee can be obtained for fifty cents.

Try Cassin's California Grape Brandy Bitters if you want to give tone to your system. There's merit in them.

"THE BEST MAN WINS HER."

I.

HID away in the loveliest part of Perthshire, nestling among the often sung Braes of Balquhidder, lies Loch Voel, upon the shores of which Rob Roy lived and died; and where, in the quiet lonely kirkyard rests "Clan Alpin's omen and her aid." There are M'Gregors still in the clachan of Balquhidder, M'Gregors who speak with glistening eye and heightened color of the chief, and amongst whom no tales are so popular as those which treat of the wild days when the clan with the "name nameless by day" was at once the terror and protection of the country. Every child knows the story of the feuds between the M'Larens and the M'Gregors, and how the Stewarts of Appin, coming to help their kinsmen, were met by the clansmen at the clachan, where Rob Roy challenged any one of the Appin to single combat, eager, by every such personal hazard, to avert the horrors of a battle. They will tell you, too, how the great Duke of Athol exhausted his time and patience in trying to catch Rob Roy; and the story of the funeral, when Lady Glenfalloch, thinking her brother was slain, sprang upon the Duke, and, dragging him from his horse, gave him such a taste of the tenderness of the M'Gregors that he took timely warning and retired, leaving Rob Roy to bury his mother in peace and quiet.

Some ten years ago, a descendant of the Rob Roy's, Helen M'Gregor, was the beauty of Balquhidder. Helen was a fair, blue-eyed, golden-haired lassie, with whom life had been one long laugh, and to whom the world seemed to bear neither frowns nor clouds. Her father, Tam M'Gregor, was a farmer, and well-to-do for his station; his son helped him on the hills, and Helen was a tidy hand in the house, quite able to take many cares off her mother's shoulders.

The cottage stood away from the clachan, near the foot of the Meal-mach. A lovely little steading it was too, with high gray rocks on one side, on the other an oak and birch wood, among the branches of which the soft summer breezes, when they had kissed the lake into a ripple of delight, would sigh, and whisper their pleasant songs of brighter and warmer lands.

Tam's cottage had served the wants of many a generation of M'Gregors, here a little and there a little being added, as the owner's family increased or his fortunes prospered. The thatch was matted together by a flourishing growth of various plants, wallflowers and house-leech predominating. Roses and honeysuckle flourished in the narrow border, and, clustering round the windows, met gay and thriving geraniums, votive offerings from the gardener at Glenbuckie, who was one of Helen's many admirers. Helen, being fancy-free herself, was wont to make a joke about love; and not caring for fairs or gatherings, escaped much of the gossip which attaches to other girls. Yet, quietly as the little maiden lived, she could no more avoid lovers than can the violet hide away her treasures from the bee. "Love will venture in whar he darna weel be seen," and accordingly Helen's lovers were neither few nor slack in making their way to the larm; while, much to the girl's discomfort, her mother took pride to herself in counting the stalwart, well-to-do lads who would take a place by the ingle-nook, and while talking to the farmer of the ewes, wool, and markets, would hope to catch a stray glance, kinder than usual, from Helen; who, however, went on with her spinning as if no eyes were seeking hers, and there were no such thing as love and wooing. And many a lad doubtless thought with Hobbie Elliott, that "whirling a bit stick wi' a thread trailing to it," was but poor and tiresome work.

One man came oftener than the rest, so often that it was whispered about that Helen and Duncan were courting, nor did Duncan attempt to deny what he wished in his inmost heart was true. He had loved Helen long, and had only waited for a farm to enter the lists openly. Now he had a farm and a decent house to take a wife to, he thought the right time had come; and soon, seeing he had the good will of both father and mother, he was content to wait patiently until some happy day when Helen's heart would waken up, and his love meet its reward. And if Ducan was patient, it was because, never having doubted his success, he experienced a sort of gratification in beating down his passion, or anticipating from a distance the time when Helen would spin upon his own hearth, and pay him back tenfold for what she made him suffer now.

The honest folk in Balquhidder called Helen a lucky lassie, and watched the courting with general interest, not unmixed with envy, for Duncan was one of the handsomest and steadiest of the young men; more than that, and what perhaps went even further among the girls, Duncan was the champion wrestler, runner and hammer thrower, and twice had he carried off prizes from the Braemer Gathering. Duncan's courting had made no further impression upon Helen when the Gathering of 185– drew on. All the world went to Braemer that year, and Duncan, much to his own surprise and the indignation of the Balquhidder people, was beaten both in wrestling and throwing by a new-comer, a young man who, by his superior style of dress and manner of speech, was evidently from a different part of the country, if not indeed of a different rank in life to that of the irate young Highlander; and when standing hot and angry after his last failure, he was by no means comforted by seeing Helen's cheeks redden under the glances of the victor, who, cap in hand, introduced himself to Tam M'Gregor as the son of his old friend, Niel Lesley, and saying that he had come to the Gatheriug on his way to Balquhidder, his father having told him of the sheep-farming there, and how, for auld acquaintance' sake, he might be able to get his lesson in the management of flocks from Tam himself, a lesson he meant to put in practice in Australia. Tam was pleased to find his friend had not forgotten him, nor was he proof against the compliment offered to his farming skill. Moreover there is never a lack of hospitality among the Celts, and Tam made his young friend welcome to the best his house afforded so long as he liked to stay.

Niel was a fair-haired, blue-eyed man, tall and light-limbed, but with the muscles and sinews of a prize-fighter. He had been at the High School in Edinburgh, was well up in modern topics, and was able to hold forth upon subjects which rarely reached the ears of the inhabitants of the Braes, except when the shooting season brought down the great folk, and the great folk brought their servants; then politics, parliaments, and the court, were familiarly discussed in every shieling.

Niel was no idler, either in work, or play, or love. Everything he set his hand to he did in the manner, we are told, sure to succeed. So no wonder that, falling in love, as he did at once, he roused what poor Duncan had waited for in vain; and, woking up the sleeping heart, brought the love-light into the sweet hazel eyes, that softened and drooped now as they had never done before any man's gaze. There was no question of love speech between the two, and yet, before the summer came, Helen had found out what a different pluce love could make the world. There had never been such heather on the hills, or bracken and wild roses on the braes, as now bloomed; the love-filter was now actiug, aud nature took tone, as it always does, from the heart.

"How bonnie you're growing, Nelly," said Tam one day. "What's come to the lassie, wife? She's breakiu' the hearts o' half the lads in the place. There 's Duncan, puir laid, fient a smile he'll gie now, but gangs as dour——"

"Wheesht, faither!" cried Helen, shutting his mouth with a rosy little palm. "Here's Duncan comin'."

As she spoke Ducan stalked up to the door. It was easy to see something had gone against the grain; the expression of his face, the tone of his voice, his very gait were changed. Helen's color deepened. Somethiug in the man's eyes struck her like a knife to the heart, and lay there rankling, making the hot blood spring to her face. But the flush faded the next moment, and a shudder shook her from head to foot, for Niel came in from the hill, and as he turned the corner of the hedge, and Duncan's eyes fell upon him, Helen saw the thick black brows drawn passionately together, the big veins start like knotted cords, and the strong teeth set hard in the nether lip. She saw this, and even then her heart sank with an undefined fear; but it was not until some days afterwards, when the braes were ringing with the mysterious disappearance of Niel Lesley, that the full significance of that look was revealed to her.

II.

Many and various were the reports circulated, until by the expiration of four days they all settled down into one strong judgment against Niel—a judgment which Helen's outburst of grief and pale stricken face unwittingly strengthened; and it was firmly believed that Niel, having won her love, had grown tired of her, and to rid himself of her and his debt of gratitude to her futher at once, had made moolight flitting. Duncan took little part in what was said, so much so, that those busy people, who are always, in all ranks, looking into their neighbors' affairs, began to hold him up as an example of unselfish generosity. There was one, however, to whom his silence had a different signification, and that was Helen, who from the day the alarm was given, had remembered that afternoon when she saw, as plainly as if written in black and white, the hatred unto death stamped in Duncan's face. She alone, watching as none other could, heard the impatient manner of speech, and saw the strange look that had come upon the man's face; and a horrible suspicion and dread filled her mind harder to bear than all the cruel things raised against Niel's character. There was one small ray of comfort left,—a colley dog she had given Niel had disappeared the same day he was missed. He must be alive if "Moss" was with him; and if he had run away, as the people said, he would scarcely take such a continual sting to his conscience, as the faithful dog must be. So, in spite of the deadly fears that would at times overwhelm her, Helen held fast by hope, hiding her anxiety as best she could by getting away amongst the hills, and wandering about where she would meet no one to pity or condole with her.

The fifth day had come; it was a busy time, too, for they were gathering the flocks off the hills previous to the shooting season, and so it came about that Helen fell in with a flock in a lonely pass on the road to Ben Ledi, and, eager to escape the sheperds, she scrambled up the banks and hid herself among the whins.

Down the pass came the sheep, filling the air with their voices, stopping now and then to snatch a mouthful of heather. Presently, glancing away to the hill side, Helen caught sight of a dog bounding down over scaur and bush; but not until it was nearer, and falling into his old trade, stood yelping and howling over the flock, waking every echo in the pass, and rousing a perfect storm of bleating, did Helen note it was "Moss."

Helen tried to whistle, but her lips were shaking and dry. Then she called him by name. The dog came rushing up to her side, licking her hands and face. As soon as she could see anything clearly through the tears that were blinding her, she saw that a blue ribbon was tied round Moss's neck, nearly hidden amongst the thick wool. Helen recognized the ribbon; it had once been hers; and she knew no hand but Niel's could have tied it there, and— But suddenly she ceased thinking. She had unfastened the string, and found a little bit of white calico, and read on it, written in blood, the words, "Help! Reiver's Crag."

Helen cannot tell to this day how she got home; but in little more than half an hour the clachan was deserted, and men and women were all on their way to the Reiver's Crag, a barren rock among the mountains, from which it was said a Cumberland reiver had been flung in the old day. The miles of moss and muirland were soon crossed, and by evening Niel Lesley was rescued from a living death, and safe, but not sound, at Tam M'Gregor's. Sound, poor lad! they whispered, he never would be again.

"He had slipped over the Crag, and in going down had caught at a whin bush, which checked the impetus of his descent, and instead of going to the bottom of the cleft, he had fallen on a ledge. Here Moss had followed, but it was the fourth day before he could get the faithful dog to leave him, and bear home tidings that might save him."

Such was the account Niel gave. Time passed on and Niel was unable to walk, but his health was all right, and the doctors said he might get strong again in time. Niel never complained. It was only when pain kept him restless at night that the thought of being a cripple for life crushed him, and brought out all the training given by a good mother, and the stanch religious feeling inherent in almost every Scottish heart.

It was nearly a month since the day Niel had been carried home from the Crag. Night had just come, still, warm, and almost like twilight. Tam was smoking his pipe prepatory to his early bedtime, the women folks were knitting, and Niel, lying upon a couch the liard's sister had sent him, was reading "Rob Roy" aloud, much to Tam's perplexity, who interrupted many times with denunciations against the text. Suddenly the open doorway darkened, and Duncan stood in the entry.

"Welcome, lad," cried Tam. "Ye're jist in time to hear the havers, they buik folk pit in prent aboot the M'Gregors. Read that again, Niel, that whar he says—"

But Duncan interrupted him.

"I didna cross the door to hear lees read. I cam to speak aboot a lee, to tell ye"—and his voice grew louder and hoarser as he spoke—"to tell ye that ane ye liked weel is a leer. We're a' frien's here," he said, in a different voice, looking round.

"Ay, ay, man. Sit doon," said Tam, taking his pipe out of his mouth, aud turning to have a better look at Duncan. "Why, what ails ye, man?"

"Mickle ails me, Tam M'Gregor, and I cam on a goursome errand. I hae come to tak' awa' ye're faith in man lor evermair, and to shame a hypocrite wi' the fair truth."

Helen laid down her knitting and drew nearer Niel; Tam glanced at him too. Niel's face was crimson, and his eyes, all dilated and eager, stared up at that wild-looking man, glowering down upon him who went on speaking.

"Stop him, Helen!" shouted Niel, trying to get up, bnt failing, he pushed the girl toward Duncan. "Stop him, for God's sake! The lad's mad. He doesn't know what he's saying. Don't listen to him, Tam. He's a fine fellow, and you all hear me say it. Duncan, man, shake hands with me, and do go quietly away, and let well alone."

Duncan's answer was to drop down upon his knees by Niel's side, and, covering his face sob aloud.

"Na, na, Niel, I canna let alane. I mann tell them. Let me bide, lad; it's the fittest place. And whan I hae your forgiveness, I'll gang on my knees to the Almighty; but I canna usk Him till I have confessed my sin."

"Well, let me tell it, Duncan," said Niel, gently, layiug his hand upon the kneeling man's shoulder.

"No!" cried the other, sternly; "I'll no get the warst. Tam and Helen, I am a murderer, or as bad, for I had the thocht in my heart to take his life. Niel cut me oot wi' you, Nelly. Mad wi' jealousy, I said we'd gang to the Reiver's Crag, and the best man shall win ye. Niel wad hardly gang till I telt him I'd ca' him through the country-side for a coward, und then he went. But whan I got to the top o' the Crag, the diel got possession o' me, and catchin' him unaware I hurled him ower, thinking deed men tell nae tales. I never thocht o' the colley. Whan I heerd tell he was fund, I was like to gang mad. Every fot I thocht was a pollis; but whan, the days passed, and Niel never tauld, it was war than a' The hot burnin' coals were heaped on my heed, burnin' and smotherin' i' the brain, till this gloaming the thocht cam to make a clean breast, and then gang awa' whar I'd never see a kenned face till the day o' judgment. Oh! Niel man, ye ken what loving her is; but even you canna tell what my heart was, and how neither bluid nor damnation were ony worth if I could only ha' won her here. You canna forgie me, Nelly lass, for I hae made him a cripple; but just say, 'Duncan, I'll ask the Lord to forgie ye,' and I'll gang awa' content."

Tam was the last to hold ont the hand of forgiveness; but he, too, did so at last, and then Duncan went away.

Upon the top of the bank he turned, and, cap in hand, stood looking at the cottage. "Puir lad! he's prayin', may be," thought Mrs. M'Gregor, who had followed her old favorite to the door.

Two years afterwards, and a few weeks after Niel and Helen were married, a letter came to the former—a letter written by a comrade of Duncan's, and then they knew for the first time that he had enlisted, and, going to India with one of the gallant regiments afterwards nicknamed "Sir Colin's petticoats," the poor broken hearted lad had found the death he coveted before the walls of Lucknow, and was lying mortally wounded in the hospital, where he dictated his first and last letter to Niel, bidding him good by, and telling him to let the Balquhidder folk know the true story of the Reiver's Crag.

MILLINERY AND HEAD-DRESSES.—Mrs. Winship has just received, per last steamer, the latest Parisian Millinery Goods and Laces for HEAD-DRESS, consisting in part of Breakfast Caps, Point Application, Lace Vallenciumes, and the Widow's Rooche, worn by the crown beads of Europe, and the only first imported to the Pacific Coast. Queen Emma, while here, replenished her wardrobe from the stock then and now on hand, at MRS. WINSHIP, No. 23 Post Street, under the Mechanics' Institute. Through the influence of Queen Emma, Mrs. Winship has filled quite a number of orders for the foreign population of Honolulu. The ladies of San Francisco should call and examine these beautiful Goods, by which means they will secure the Latest Fashionable Styles.

MAYER'S BAZAAR.—R. Mayer offers at his Bazaar, corner Pine and Montgomery streets, the greatest variety of jewelry, watches, silver plated ware, guitars, music boxes; concertinas, accordeons, opera glasses, etc., etc., to the public of San Francisco, and to the country trade, at prices that defy competition, and is determined to close out his present stock at greatly reduced rates. His heavy case silver watches from the American Watch Company are superior to anything ever before offered to the public. These watches are taking the place of heavy gold watches from the fact that the workmanship is superior, the castings pure silver, and the prices low. The sale of these watches is very extensive on the Pacific coast. Another proof that American manufactures can beat the world. The works are made of platina and never get out of repair. French opera glasses of great power for sale or hire, and all kinds of musical instruments, eight day family clocks, etc. This is a rare chance to invest your money to advantage, at Mayer's Bazaar, southeast corner of Montgomery and Pine streets.

N. B.—An immense assortment of Japanese curiosities for sale.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

A FEATURE OF THE PROCESSION ON THE FOURTH.

Many striking peculiarities were presented in the grand procession on the Fourth, and none more notable than the display made by the Builders' Insurance Company. Its mammoth triumphal car, mounted with a bust of Washington, and ornamented with paintings emblematical of Union, Industry and Progress, was filled with a score of youths dressed in gala costume, who scattered thousands of copies of an address to the multitude which thronged the sidewalks on either side, as the procession passed along. The car, which was very tasteful in design and finish, was constructed by Mr. J. D. Connell, and bore the motto, "Labor is Capital," and the proud war cry of the Builders' Insurance Company, "We save you half a Million Dollars a Year," alluding to the great reduction in the rates of insurance which that Company has caused in this State. The address, which we subjoin, is a very peculiar one and is more pregnant of political truths than either of those which were issued by the present gubernatorial candidates, and as such we bespeak the reader's careful attention to it:

ADDRESS—FOURTH OF JULY, 1867.

To the Industrial Portion of the People of Calieornia—Fellow citizens: The founders of the BUILDERS' INSURANCE COMPANY would speak home truths to you to-day.

We have done you substantial service, and have thereby qualified ourselves to offer you advice. There is a political struggle approaching, in which you toiling people have more at stake than the wealthy. A vail of delusion hangs over your vision. Issues are presented to you which are of no more substantial interest to you than the issues prevailing in Japan. Men make their love for this glorious Republic their qualification for office—for trust and for salaries. This is a spurious pretense. We all love this glorious Republic, and no thanks to us for that. Living on the people, on the strength of our 'love for the Union,' is about played out. We must demand from the men who are to be our lawmakers and our public servants, something more than a profession of their love for this Republic.

We must demand from them principles and pledges to abate abuses; diminish taxes; develop employment; encourage manufactures; oppose coolies; lead industrial enterprise; diminish the hours of labor; increase the comforts of the industrious; discourage the land-grabbers; give a tenure in the land to those who will settle on and cultivate it; protect the miner and the mechanic; encourage white immigration; assist the farmers to open roads and increase facilities of intercourse to markets.

These are among the things the people require to be done by their public servants; but how precious few of the public candidates refer at all to these important works. The sum and substance of their pretentions qualifications consist in the very important fact of their having voted some years ago for the late Mr. Lincoln, or for General McClellan! These tests are the merest delusions—mere vapor. The real questions are dodged. The real questions and the main questions for the toiling men of California are:

Shall we pay two dollars taxes to the Federal Government at Washington for the one dollar paid by the citizens of any other State of the Union? Shall we surrender this fair country to a horde of Asiatic infidels, whose leprous contact is death to our civilization and independence? Shall we work two hours a day more than is necessary, in order to support a swarm of loafers who are employed under one pretense or another as 'public servants;' one set of them collecting revenues and another of them spending it! The whole of them living on the sweat of the toilers—whom the toilers can very well do without?

Now, the candidates for public honors and public trusts in California don't touch on those topics at all. Not they! They raise up different issues; different isms to blind your eyes, Oh! Toilers.

Our advice to you, industrious bees, is to open your eyes to your true condition. Let labor at length and at last come to the front: let it be properly organized; let it be sober; let it be orderly; let it be patient. With those endowments, there is no office in the State which labor may not fill.

Law-making and legislation have been run into the ground. We have had too many law-makers, and too many laws: too much talking, and too much tinkering with the laws, so that no man is now sure what laws shall be in force in this State a year hence! Toilers, put an end to this. Try for once what the Sons of Labor can do. Try for once to do without log-rolling, wire-pulling, swapping votes and secret bribery. Let us have a man of Toil from each trade to represent the city in the Legislature.

Let us have an honest Farmer taken from the plow, like Cincinnatus, to fill the Governor's chair. Place within his horny hand the sceptre of authority, and sustain him in braving the dangers and defeats of a political encounter. Even if defeated now, your great cause will remain untarnished by debasement, unsubdued by defeat, to triumph in the end.

This is the unbought advice to you of the Managers of the BUILDER'S INSURANCE COMPANY, who will stand by your order and your interest to the last.

San Francisco, July 4th, 1867.

The BUILDER'S INSURANCE portion of the procession, when the city programme terminated, wound round a few streets and brought up at the Turn Verein Hall, on Bush street, where a handsome collation was prepared for the employées of the establishment (some twenty persons), who had formed the principal group in the procession.

Mr. Mooney, the President, when the substantial things on the board were disposed of, proposed a few toasts, with suitable remarks:

1st. The land we live in—the envy of the surrounding nations and the admiration of the world.

2d. The Government of the United States based on the affections of the people.

3d. The President of the United States, the first officer of a great people.

4th. The Builder's Insurance Company—an infant giant.

5th. The day and principles we celebrate. May those principles be speedily extended to the oppressed nationalities of Europe.

Several other toasts of a personal nature were given and responded to. Ireland, Germany, Italy and France, were duly remembered by the representatives of those countries, and the Builder's Insurance Company retired from the day's display, with new honors fairly won on a fair field of honorable competition.

May their substance increase, and their shadow be extended.

IN THE PROBATE COURT OF THE CITY AND County of San Francisco, State of California.

In the matter of the Estate of GEORGE E. PATTERSON, deceased.

Order to show cause why order of distribution should not be made.

On reading and filing the petition of J. W. Brumagin, the administrator of the estate of George E. Patterson, deceased, setting forth that he has filed his final account of his administration of the estate of said deceased, in this Court, and that the same has been duly settled and allowed; that all the debts and expenses of administration have been duly paid; and that a portion of said estate remains to be divided among the heirs of said deceased, and praying among other things for an order of distribution of the residue of said estate among the persons entitled:

It is Ordered, that all persons interested in the estate of said George E. Patterson, deceased, be and appear before the Probate Court of the city and county of San Francisco, at the Court room of said Court, in the City Hall in said city and county, on MONDAY, the twelfth day of August, Anno Domini 1867, at eleven o'clock, A. M., then and there to show cause why an order of distribution should not be made of the residue of said estate among the heirs of the said George E. Patterson, deceased, according to law.

It is further Ordered, that a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks, before the said twelfth day of August, A. D. 1867, in The Californian, a newspaper printed and published in the said city and county.

M. C. BLAKE, Probate Judge.

A Physician's Appetite.—The following extraordinary but well authenticated statement appars in the Londou Medical Times:

The celebrated Dr. Fordycee dined every day for more than twenty years at Dolly's chop-house. His researches in comparative anatomy had led him to conclude that man, through custom, eats oftener than nature requires, one meal a day being sufficient for that noble animal, the lion. At 4 o'clock, his accustomed hour of diuing, the Doctor regularly took the seat at a table always reserved for him, ou which was placed a silver tankard fu'l of strong ale, a bottle of port a measure containing a quarter of a pint of brandy. Th moment the waiter announced him the cook put a pound and a half of rump steak on the gridiron, and on the table some delicate trifle as a bon bouche to serve until the steak was ready. This was sometimes half a broiled chicken, somestimes a plate of fish. When he had eaten this he took one glass of brandy, and then proceeded to devour his steak. When he had fiuished his meal he took the remainder of his braudy, having during his dinner drank the tankard of ale, and afterwards the bottle of port. He thus daily spent an hour and a half of his time, and then returned to his house in Essex street to give his six o'clock lecture on chemistery. He made no other meal until his return next day at four olclock to Dolly's.

GRAND TRIAL
....OF....
SEWING MACHINES,
CONTEST BETWEEN THE
FLORENCE AND WILLCOX & GIBBS.
THE
WILLCOX & GIBBS
TRIUMPHANT!

At the Great UNION FAIR, held at Island Park, between Albany and Troy, in September, two Premiums were offered on Sewing Machines, one for the best and the other for the "Second Best"—competition being open to the State.

On the first day of the Fair, the Troy Agent of Florence Sewing Machine Company, having, jointly with the Albany Agent of the same Machine, entered it for competition, published in the Troy Daily Times a challenge to Agents of other Sewing Machines, to meet them at said Fair and compete with them for the Premium.

The challenge was accepted by the Troy and Albany Agents of the Willcox and Gibbs Machine.

Each party was to prepare and subject to the judges a "list" of the several "points of merit" on account of which "superiority" was claimed. These "points" were to be separately considered, thoroughly investigated and practically tested, by work done then and there, upon each of the machines; and then decided in favor of the machine which was adjudged to excel on that "point."

Finally it was agreed that the machine which, at the conclusion of the trial, should be found to have the greatest number of those "points" decided in its favor should be decided the "Best Sewing Machine," and awarded the First Premium.

The result of the trial was, that the

WILLCOX & GIBBS WON THE VICTORY

and the prize, by the extraordinary superiority of thirty-five points, decided in its favor, against two points in favor of the Florence.

Full notes were taken of the trial.

It is a fact worthy of remark, that during the entire trial—which continued without intermission for nearly seven hours—not a stitch was missed, nor the thread once broken, nor a needle broken or bent, by the Willcox and Gibbs machine. No kind of work was attempted to be done on it that was not accomplished, and done in a perfect and workmanlike manner; and no effort was made on it that was not entirely successful; while neither of these statements can be truly made in favor of the Florence.

This remarkable trial can not fail, through the facts developed by it, to be productive of important results. It has raised the veil and exposed to public view the true character of the opposition, who will no longer be able to deceive the public by misrepresenting the character and merits of the Willcox and Gibbs machine.

It is an improvement on double thread machines; and its "stitch," which was severely tested by the Judges, was decided to be much stronger and less liable to rip in use or wear than the "Lock Stitch."

It is the simplest in construction—does the greatest variety of work—makes no noise—is not liable to get out of order—costs the least money, and gives the the best satisfaction.

THE AVITOR "HERMES."

The following Report has been addressed to the Pattentee of the Avitor, by G. K. Gluyas, Esq., President of the Mechanic's Institute, and Superintending Engineer of the California S. N. Company.

Report of the Construction and Prospects of the

"AVITOR:"

SAN FRANCISCO, June 7, 1867

F. MARRIOTT, ESQ—Dear Sir:—Having visited on Wednesday last, the Avitor building, at Shell Mound Park, and inspected the machine, I take the pleasure in recording my impressions in favor of this invention. I was careful to learn details, and to study the Avitor, in order to speak, so far as I might be, with knowledge; and I am satisfied that the principle here followed is the right one.

The machine is light, solid and well finished. I think there is needed greater capacity for holding of gas, and a modification of the machine to enable it to be compressed, that the gas-holder may the more readily be filled with pure gas. The arrangements for controlling and managing the different portions of the machinery could not be better; the engine I think adequate to perform all the services required of it. As regards the probable velocity of the Avitor, I would say nothing. Once afloat, and I see nothing to hinder its floating; it is merely a question of resistance. For an invention so novel, the Avitor has met with comparatively few practical obstacles; and when it is remembered that the difficulties in the way of Fulton's experiment were much greater than those that have kept back the Avitor, and that the principal is in both cases equally sound it will be seen that there are good reasons for the belief that the machine, with the modifications referred to, will yet successfully navigate the air.

The experiments with petroleum as a steam generator, which, no doubt, will be successful, will furnish a compact and light fuel for generating steam. After the Avitor has been floated, there may be some slight changes of the propelling machinery suggested, but, ultimately, it must be a success. The expense to make the contemplated changes, or rather enlargement, of the machine, I think, will be under three thousand dollars.

Hoping and firmly believing in the success of your enterprise, I remain your obedient servant,

GEO. K. GLUYAS.

OPINION OF PETER DONAHUE ESQ.

I have followed with great interest, and have personally observed the construction of the Avitor. I am so thoroughly convinced of the practicability of the enterprise, and so entirely concur in the foregoing observations of Geo. K. Gluyas, Esq., respecting the two modifications to be adopted, that I have no hesitation in saying that, when these changes are made, the Avitor will answer all the purposes of its inventor, and fully realize the expectations of the public. As soon as the elevating power shall, in this way, have been perfected, the work will be completed because the propelling force is ample, the machinery for elevating and depressing sufficient, and steering apparatus in fine working order, and, in short, the whole of the Avitor is fully under the control of the operation. Ayer's Sarsaparilla

TO

Purify the Blood.

NOT A FEW OF THE WORST DISORDERS THAT afflict mankind arise from the corruption that accumulates in the blood. Of all the discoveries that have been made to purge it out, none have been found which could equal in effect AYER'S COMPOUND EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. It cleanses and renovates the blood, instills the vigor of health into the system and purges out the humors which make disease. It stimulates the healthy functions of the body, and expels the disorders that grow and rankle in the blood. Its extraordinary virtues are not yet widely known, but, when they are, it will no longer be a question what remedy to employ in the great variety of afflicting diseases that require an alterative remedy. Such a remedy, that could be relied on, has long been sought for, and now, for the first time, the public have one on which they can depend. Our space here does not admit certificates to show its effects. But the trial of a single bottle will show to the sick that it has virtues surpassing anything they have ever taken. Sufferers from Scrofula, Scrofulous Swellings and Sores, try it and see the rapidity with which it cures. Skin Diseases, Pimples, Pustules, Blotches, Eruptions, etc., are soon cleaned out of the system.

St. Anthony's Fire, Rose or Erysipelas, Tetter or Salt Rheum, Scald Head, Ringworm, etc., should not be borne while they can be so speedily cured by AYER'S SARSAPARILLA.

Syphilis or Venereal Disease is expelled from the system by the prolonged use of this SARSAPARILLA, and the patient is left as healthy as if he never had the disease.

Female Diseases are caused by Scrofula in the blood, and are generally soon cured by this EXTRACT OF SARSAPARILLA. Price $1 per bottle, or 6 bottles for $5.

For all the purposes of a family physic, take AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS, which are everywhere known to be the best purgative that is offered to the American People.

Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & Co., Lowell, Mass., and sold by all Druggists and dealers in medicine everywhere.

TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

NEW REMEDIES! NEW REMEDIES!

Dr. Gibbon's Dispensary.

ESTABLISAED IN 1854,
616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco.

For the treatment of Sexual and Seminal Diseases, such as gonorrhœa, gleet, stricture, syphilis in all its forms, seminal weakness, impoteney, &c. Skin Diseases, (of years' standing,) and Ulcerated legs, successfully treated.

HORRIBLE DISEASES.

How many thousands of persons both male and female are there who are suffering out a miserable existence from the effects of secret indulgence, or from virus absorbed into the system. Look at their pallid, emaciated and disfigured faces, and their broken constitutions, disqualifying them for the happiness of marriage or the enjoyment of life. In this horrid situation thousands suffer until death closes the scene. Let parents, guardians and friends, attend to those who are suffering with any of these horrible, life-destroying maladies—see that they are cared for and cured before it be too late. Send them to Dr. Gibbon, a physician who has made private diseases his especial study for years, and who is certain to cure the most inveterate cases without mercury or any injurious drugs. It is important to those who are afflicted, to be careful of the many pretended Doctors who infest all cities, publishing their skill in curing all diseases in a few days, imposing upon the public by using the names of eminent physicians from Europe and other places. Be therefore careful and make strict inquiry, or you may fall into the hands of these charlatans.

Syphilis is syphilis the world over ; so is small pox, consumption, and other diseases, to the contrary of what quacks may say.

SEMINAL WEAKNESS.

Seminal weakness the consequent of self abuse. This solitary vice, or depraved sexual indulgence, is practiced by the youth of both sexes to an almost unlimited extent, producing with unerring certainty the following train of morbid symptoms, unless combatted by scientific medical measure ; sallow countenances, dark spots under the eyes, pain in the head, ringing in the ears, noise like the rustling of leaves and rattling of chariots, uneasines about the loins, weakness of the limbs, confused vision, blunt intellect, loss of confidence, diffidence in approaching strangers, a dislike to form new acquaintances, a disposition to shun society, loss of memory, hectic flushes, pimples and various eruptions about the face, furred tongue, fetid breath, coughs, consumption, night sweats, monomania, and frequent insanity. If relief be not obtained, should apply immediately, either in person or by letter, and have a cure effected by his new and scientific mode of treating this complaint, which never fails of effecting a quick and radical cure. Dr. G. will give $100 to any person who will prove satisfactorily to him that he was cured by either of the San Francisco quacks.

Dr. Gibbon is responsible, and will give each patient a written instrument binding himself to effect a radical and permanent cure or make no charge.

Persons at a distance may be cured at home by addressing a letter to Dr. Gibbon, stating case, symptoms, length of time the disease has continued, and have medicine promptly forwarded, free from damage and curiosity, to any part of the country, with full and plain directions for use, for ten dollars, sent in a registered letter, or through Wells, Fargo & Co.

Address DR. J. F. GIBBON, 616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco, Postoffice Box 252.

CAUTION TO THE UNFORTUNATE.

Beware of the San Francisco quacks and pretenders who with bogus sworn-to certificates, dupe the unwary. Some of the self styled doctors whose names are to be found in all the daily and weekly papers of San Francisco and other places, are tradesmen, and become too lazy to work at their trade. Some are tinsmiths, shoemakers, newspaper carriers, intelligence offices keepers, etc. Look over the San Francisco City Directory and you will find their former occupation in it. Look at the Directory for 1862-63. The only way to avoid imposition is make inquiry—it will cost you nothing and may save you many regrets, for advertising physicians in eight cases out of ten are bogus, there is no safety in trusting any of them till you know who and what they are. Dr. Gibbon does not deceive people by exhibiting bogus titles, certificates, pretended patients' letters, etc. Dr. Gibbon will satisfy persons who may call at his office of his ability to treat diseases that he proposes to cure.

☞ Persons writing to Dr. Gibbon will Please state the name of the paper they see his advertisement in.

CHASTELLAR'S

HAIR EXERMINATOR, FOR REMOVING

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR.

TO THE LADIES ESPECIALLY, THIS INVALUABLE depilatory recommends itself as being an almost indispensable article to female beauty, is easily applied, does not burn or injure the skin, but acts directly on the roots. It is warranted to remove superfluous hair from low foreheads, or from any part of the body, completely, totally and radically extirpating the same, leaving the skin soft, smooth and natural. This is the only article used by the French, and is the only real effectual depilatory in existence. Price 75 cents per package, sent post paid, to any address, on receipt of an order by

BERGER, SHUTTS & CO., Chemists,
285 River street, Troy, N. Y.

There cometh glad tidings of joy to all,
To young and old, to great and to small;
The beauty which was once so precious and rare,
Is free for all, and all may be fair.

By the use of

CHASTELLAR'S

WHITE LIQUID ENAMEL,

FOR IMPROVING AND BEAUTIFYING THE COMplexion.

The most valuable and perfect preparation in use, for giving the skin a beautiful pearl-like tint, that is only found in youth. It quickly removes Tan, Freckles, Pimples, Blotches, Moth Patches, Sallowness, Eruptions, and all impurities of the skin, kindly healing the same, leaving the skin white and clear as alabaster. Its use cannot be detected by the closest crutiny, and being a vegetable preparation is perfectly harmless. It is the only article of the kind used by the French, and is considered by the Parisian as indispensable to a perfect toilet. Upwards of 30,000 bottles were sold during the past year, a sufficient guarantee of its efficacy. Price only 75 cents. Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of order, by

IN THE PROBATE COURT of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

In the matter of the estate of JOHN BARKER, deceased.

In reading and filing the petition of Grace Barker, Administratrix, of the estate of John Barker, deceased, showing that her final account of her administration has been duly filed, allowed, confirmed, and settled ; and praying for an order of distribution of the residue of said estate among the persons by law entitled thereto, to wit : to said petioner.

It is ordered, that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased, be and appear before this Probate Court, at the Court Room thereof, in the City Hall, in said City and County, on TUESDAY, the 13th day of August, A. D., 1867, at 11 o'clock, A. M., of that day, then and there to show cause, if any they have, why an order of distribution should not be made of the residue of said estate, according to law.

It is further ordered, that a copy of this order be published at least four successive weeks before said 13th day of August, A. D. 1867, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in said city and county.

M C. BLAKE, Probate Judge.

Dated July 3d, A. D. 1867.

Office of the County Clerk of the City and County of San Francisco.—I, Wm. Loewy, County Clerk of the city and county of San Francisco, and ex-officio Clerk of the Probate Court thereof, do hereby certify the foregoing to be a full, true and correct copy of an order duly made and entered upon the minutes of the said Court.

Witness my hand, and the seal of said Court, this 5th day of July, A. D. 1867.

W. G. JONES PROPRIETOR

BABBITTONIAN,

OR SELF-TEACHING

PENMANSHIP

The System of Babbitonian Penmanship is pre-eminently self-instructing. With its ample explanations of right and wrong forms—its sixty wood cuts—its plain intelligent rules, one may sit down by his own fireside and become a finer Penman than he could at much greater cost in the usual way with a living teacher.

There is a great demand for fine Penmen in the commercial world, and this system, at a trifling expense, imparts a skilful command of the Pen, worth hundreds of dollars to the fortunate possessor.

Penmanship is an indispensable accomplishment to Ladies, and this system is elaborate in a series of elegant copies in the Ladies' Style.

Business men have sometimes lost thousands of dollars from ignorance in regard to Business forms, and there is furnished in a set, without additional charge, a fine variety of Business Forms and Abbreviations. To sum up the Excellencies of this System, it is—

1—Scientific in its Arrangement of Principles;
2—Artistic in its Movements and Flourishes;
3 —Practical in its Combinations and Applications;
4—Stylish in its neat and chaste Gracefulness;
5—Superior for Legibility, Rapidity and Beauty;
6—Most Disciplinary for fingers, Arms and Muscles.
7—Unexcelled for Comprehensiveness and Simplicity.
8—Complete and Self-Teaching for Private Learners;
9—Time, Labor and Expense Saving for Pupils and Teachers.

The Babbitonian Penmanship

Is published on durable card-board slips, ninety-two copies illustrated, put in a neat package with a Chart, the whole complete at the low price of $1 50.

Babbittonian Pens.

One reason why the country is flooded with poor Pens is that they are generally made by mechanics, rather than by artistic and experienced Penmen, the only parties really understanding the requirements of a good article.

The Babbittonian Pens,

Made in the most finished style, by skilful artisans, after models prepared according to the combined wisdom and experience of several amateurs and old Professors of Penmanship, are admirably adapted to meet the public wants.

The Babbittonian Ladies' Pen,

Is one of the most exquisite little instruments for delicate writing ever constructed.

The Babbittonian Extra Fine Pen,

Is pronounced by a large number of Penmen to be more free, more durable, and more varied in capacity for either fine or course strokes than any foreign Pen whatever. Suitable for elegant writing, it is a great favorite with the ladies and gentlemen.

The Babbittonian Business Pen,

Having great freedom and variety of movement, is unequaled for general business or school purposes. Somewhat coarser than the Extra Fine, it wears longer and moves more easily on paper.

☞ This Pen is now in use in the large counting-houses and banks in this city.

A RARE GEM OF ART.

"The Lord's Prayer,"

A pen drawing, by Mr. D. F. Brown, is one of the most remarkable works of art ever exhibited in this country. By patient labor he has succeeded in producing a design which for skill and beauty of execution, exquisite softness and delicacy of finish, and general merit, it would seem scarcely possible to surpass. The central figure—the face of our savior—is one of marvelous power and beauty. This and the faces of the Twelve Apostles, forming the border of the piece, are faithful copies from Leonardo da Vinci's famous painting of the

LAST SUPPER,

Re-producing, with the softest and most perfect shadings, the conceptions and characteristic expressions of the originals. Within this enclosure the words of the Lord's Prayer, in ornamental letters of various original designs and exquisite finish, are an interesting study of art in themselves; while appropriately distributed among these, miniture groups and scenes of marked events of Savior's life, copied from the great masters—five of them from Raphel's celebrated designs—form a harmonious completion of this unique, beautiful and truly wonderful work. The faces of

OUR LORD AND HIS APOSTLES.

Alone, so finely copied, would be a treasure in any house, and worth the full price of subscription.
